PREFACE

It was while reading, for this issue of the BOOK REVIEW DIGEST, a number of the late reviews which at the end of the year must be added to our record to make it complete, that a question formulated itself as to their comparative importance. They were, for the most part, taken from the American Historical Review, the Yale Review, the Hibbert Journal, and magazines of like standing, and the question ran: Is their usefulness commensurate with the thought and scholarship that have gone to their making? The answer, of course, would involve a consideration of the larger question as to the purpose of the book review: Is it to serve as a guide in book selection, or as an after appraisal of a book supposed to have been read, with a view to the fixing of its permanent standing. Perhaps the natural tendency of the BOOK REVIEW DIGEST is to consider the matter too much from the one standpoint—the utilitarian—to look upon the review as an instrument only, as a guide. For as such, it is evident, it must serve to one class at least—to the buyers of books, especially to the professional buyer, the librarian, who must stand between the world of newly published books and the reading public.

With this question in mind a few simple tests were made. The eleven books reviewed in the October number of one important quarterly—the Yale Review—were listed. Of these it was found that two had been published in 1910; six in 1912; one in February, and one in March, 1913. Of the books reviewed in the November number of the Journal of Political Economy, a monthly, it was found that one had been published in 1911; five in 1912; one in February, one in March, and five in April, 1913.

The moment to decide on a book's purchase comes early in its history. In important cases the library cannot wait seven months for the judgment of the scholarly reviewer. And it is the scholarly review that is late; it is the specialized periodical that gives belated notice to the literature of its own specialty. For another test, we chose at random, Alger's "Old Law and the New Order," a book published in March, 1913. It was reviewed in the New York Times on April 20th; in the American Political Science Review, and the Journal of Political Economy in November. The reviews of this one work, as listed in our BOOK REVIEW DIGEST, appeared in the following order: New York Times, A. L. A. Booklist, Nation, Annals of the American Academy, Literary Digest, Survey, American Political Science Review, Journal of Political Economy. "Immigration and Labor," by Isaac Hourwich, was published late in 1912. It was reviewed in the New York Times of December 22, 1912; in the Review of Reviews of January, 1913; American Economic Review, June, 1913; American Journal of Sociology, July, 1913.

We should not, of course, plead for a hurried and careless reviewing of serious and weighty books. The sober second thought represented in these careful analyses of earlier published works is not to be deprecated, and it is to be expected, in the nature of things, that the weekly and the bi-weekly will be more timely in the matter of reviewing current literature than will the monthly and the quarterly, but the situation, from the point of view of the librarian and of the specialist, professors and the like who must count the pennies spent for books, remains regrettable. They must make their choice unaided or on the passing word of the general reviewer.

OTHER ABBREVIATIONS:

Abbreviations of publishers' names will be found in the Publishers' Directory at the end of The Cumulative Book Index.

An asterisk (*) before the price indicates those books sold at a limited discount and commonly known as net books.

The superior figure at the beginning of the second line of the entry indicates the month when the book received its first mention in this publication.

The descriptive note is separated from critical notices of a book by a dash.

The plus and minus signs preceding the names of the magazines indicate the degrees of favor or disfavor of the entire review.

In the reference to a magazine, the first number refers to the volume, the next to the page, the letters to the date and the last figures to the number of words in the review.

A Maltese cross (✕) indicates that the A. L. A. Booklist recommends the book for small libraries, or for immediate purchase.

ABBOT, EVERETT VERGNIES. Justice and 10 the modern law. *$1.60 Houghton 13-12488

"Mr. Abbot, who is a prominent member of the New York bar, furnishes in his volume many suggestions for the protection of legal rights which will be valuable not only to lawyers but to business men in dealing with lawyers. He makes a point of the fact that there are many unconsidered but perfectly valid legal rights which need only to be understood to be enforced, and he puts within reach of the layman the information necessary to understand and take advantage of these laws."—N Y Times

In this book the author presents brief biographies of seventy women who, to quote from the title-page, "in all ages, all lands and in all womanly occupations have won fame and put their imprint on the world's history." The sketches are grouped under headings as follows: A group of classic dames; Many queens and some martyrs; Women of wit and pleasure; Priestesses of woman's cause; Some women of the footlights; Women in arts and letters. The book is illustrated with portraits.

ABBOTT, REV. EDWIN ABBOTT. Light on
9 the gospel from an ancient poet [Odes of Solomon]. *$3.75 Putnam A13-367

"The subject of this interesting and learned work is the famous collection of forty-two poems known as 'the Odes of Solomon,' and Dr. Abbott's plan is to compare the leading ideas of these compositions with early Christian and Jewish teaching on the same or cognate topics. The author of the Odes was, in Dr. Abbott's view, a Jewish Christian, writing towards the close of the first century 'under the influence of Palestinian poetry, Alexandrian allegory, Egyptian mysticism, and—most powerful of all—the influence of the Spirit of Love and Sonship freshly working in the Christian church.'"—Ath

"Mr. Abbott's work presents us with the most detailed and comprehensive commentary yet written on about a dozen of the Odes of Solomon, so encyclopedic, so full of material and suggestion, that it is quite impossible to do justice to the volume in a brief review. As to Mr. Abbott's own conclusions, it is to be expected that not everyone will agree with them." Martin Sprengling.

+ — Am J Theol 17:432 Jl '13 950w

"The learning and keenness of argument by which the [author's] position is throughout maintained cannot but compel respect and attention; and it will, we believe, be acknowledged by many that a strong case has been made out in favour of the central proposition that the Odes are Jewish Christian, and that they are the outcome of deep, personal piety. Though Dr. Abbott lays no claim to expert knowledge of Syriac, the translation deserves all praise, and much insight is also shown in the remarks on the variants found in the second ms. now available."

+ — Ath 1912,2:517 N 2 450w

"We must say that the fragment which Dr. Abbott gives us, interesting as it is, is enormously over-edited, and smothered under an overwhelming mass of not always intelligible or sane comment. The amount of labour and erudition which has been put into this work is stupendous. This is how the giants of old time were wont to scholy. But it is not everyone's reading."

ABBOTT, ELEANOR HALLOWELL. White
11 linen nurse. Il *$1 (2c) Century 13-21292

The story of the White Linen Nurse, the Senior Surgeon and the Little Crippled Girl. The White Linen Nurse on the day of her graduation indulges in hysterics. She doesn't want to be a trained nurse; her face is wearied with its noble expression; she can no longer endure its professional smile; she confesses to her shocked room mates that she took up nursing because she thought the uniforms were cute. So it came about that the White Linen Nurse didn't graduate and become a trained nurse after all but undertook instead "general heart work for a family of two," the two being the crusty nerve-tortured Senior Surgeon and his termagant of a red-haired daughter, the Little Crippled Girl.

"Miss Abbott has an original and sprightly method—but she overdoes it. Her apparent dislike of the conventional and tame lead her to exaggerate her own virtues into sensationalism. Notwithstanding these defects 'The white linen nurse' is an absorbingly interesting story."

+ — Boston Transcript p24 O 15 '13 450w

"The plot of the story is not much better, or worse, than the plots of many other stories that the magazines print; but the incidents are forced, the characters talk and behave as no conceivable or realizable human beings would naturally talk or behave, and the framework of narrative shows everywhere a straining after originality, eccentricity and sensational effect. The straining after effect, which is characteristic of 'The white linen nurse' as a whole, is particularly noticeable in what Macaulay has called the 'Turkey carpet style.'" G. Kennan.

ABBOTT, GEORGE FREDERICK. Holy war in Tripoli. *$4.20 Longmans 12-29967

An account of the Turko-Italian war written from the viewpoint of a non-combatant who was an eye witness to much of the action. Mr. Abbott, an English war correspondent, had quarters with the Turks at Azizia and his story covers the period from November 1911 to March 1912. The book is not merely a record of military maneuvers; it is "rather a description, aided by most interesting illustrations, of those features of life in an Arab camp which seem to a European picturesque. Mr. Abbott's sympathies are frankly with the Turks." (Am Hist R)

"Students who turn to 'The holy war in Tripoli' for a history of the Turkish-Italian war will be disappointed. There is here no account of events leading up to the war, no study of diplomatic and military policies at Rome or Constantinople, and no general view of operations in the field."

— Am Hist R 18:418 Ja '13 100w

"Camp life, personal adventure, events of the war as gathered from what the author considers reliable sources lose nothing in these vivid, detailed chapters."

+ A L A Bkl 9:227 F '13

"The book, though too long, and lacking any attractions of style, is full of interesting notices of persons and things, and gives an excellent picture of life in the chaotic headquarters of the Turkish army at Azizia."

+ — Ath 1912,2:404 O 12 1800w

"The pages are full enough of alarms and excursions, but our interest, and the author's evidently, is almost entirely in his background. Vigorously and in considerable detail, but without the flamboyancies that are usually considered essential to a description of the sun-baked deserts of the brooding East, Mr. Abbott has drawn an arresting picture of arid North Africa and the psychology of its people as it manifests itself in a moment of crisis."

+ — Nation 96:186 F 20 '13 230w

"Many but not all of the letters contained in this volume have been published in the 'Outlook.' All of them have been written in reply to real inquiries addressed to me either by letter or in person." (Preface) The book opens with the author's confession of faith, and the letters that follow discuss, among other subjects, these: A personal God; Nature and the gospel; Are there three Gods? Can I love God? Prayer; The second coming; The privilege of being a minister; The Bible and the child; Future punishment.

"Will be of service in helping the inquiring reader to a clearer idea of his own attitude toward the Christian faith."

ABERCROMBIE, LASCELLES. Deborah. *75c 7 Lane

A three-act play in blank verse. "The scene is laid in a fishing and pilot village on a great estuary; the background is gray water and gray sky. With the exception of a dozen words spoken by a visiting doctor, all the conversation is given to half a dozen uneducated and uncultured men and women. . . . Mr. Abercrombie's fisher-folk and Mr. Synges' peasants, though they are as unlike as wine and fire, have this in common—their speech is full of a wild and vigorous poetry." (N Y Times)

"He has relied for his tragic effect, in short, upon external circumstances of the most gloomy kind; but his characters are so incompletely realized that the story leaves the reader unmoved. The verse is always vigorous, though sometimes awkward; and here and there it reaches real beauty."

ABERCROMBIE, LASCELLES. Thomas Hardy: a critical study. *$2.50 Kennerley (Eng ed W13-2)

"Mr. Abercrombie is not the first good critic to appraise the art of Thomas Hardy; but his is the first book to be written since the whole of that art was given to the world." (N Y Times) "He has subjected the work of this author to the test, not merely of acceptable fiction, but also of art in the completest sense of the term. He has demanded of fiction that, if it is to be one of the great and finally satisfying forms of art, it must fulfil the conditions which are laid down in the greatest examples of poetry, sculpture, and drama. He has selected Mr. Hardy as his subject because he holds that he does satisfy these conditions; that, without being the most fertile and talented of English novelists, he is pre-eminent among them in making his fiction, and his work as a whole, conformable to the type of great imaginative art." (Ath)

"Mr. Abercrombie has approached his subject in an exceptionally interesting manner. His analysis of Mr. Hardy's methods is illuminating. Indeed, this is far the most critical and appreciative study that has yet been made of Mr. Hardy's contribution to literature, and we say that without forgetting Lionel Johnson and others who have written on the subject."

+ Ath 1912, 2: 616 N 23 2000w

"Certainly Mr. Abercrombie's fine study will assist the genius of Thomas Hardy to its proper appreciation. It must be read with the new Wessex edition of the novels as their fitting accompaniment." P. P. Howe.

+ N Y Times 17: 625 O 27 '12 2000w

"Whatever the cause, his theorizing and his criticism of Mr. Hardy are both interesting, but do not much help one another. He would have scored more heavily had he been content to write a book either about art or about Mr. Hardy. As it is, we regard the book as the fumes of a thinker's cauldron."

— + Sat R 114:808 D 28 '12 350w

"A compact, comprehensive and informing account of . . . that interesting period in England's development, the years between the Black death and the end of the fifteenth century." (Boston Transcript) The subject matter of the book is arranged in chapters as follows: Social classes; Life among the aristocracy; Characteristics of town life; The position of women; The church and the nation; Some aspects of monastic life; Business life; The unemployed; Aliens in England; Family life; 'Mete and drinke'; The mirror of fashion; Houses; Public health; Education; Amusements; Travelling; National character.

+ A L A Bkl 9:359 My '13

"Miss Abram's account is agreeably distinguished among books of the kind by the fact that she has gone to new sources for her material, orderly arrangement, and an appendix adding exact references. One or two slips, as where John of Gaunt's 'fermer' is taken to be a tenant, should be corrected in a new edition."

+ — Ath 1912, 2:726 D 14 500w

"The author is to be congratulated, that in reducing this mass of facts to order she has retained much of the color and sense of reality that usually distinguish original sources. The large number of illustrations also do their share in assisting the imagination to recreate the past."

"Miss Abram's trick of summing up her conclusions with an oracular judgment in the first person plural is somewhat irritating. ADAIR, WARD WILLIAM. Lure of the iron ⁵ trail. il *$1 (2½c) Assn. press 13-381

A dozen or so railroad stories, all based on the actual experiences of a man who has been for many years a worker in the railroad branch of the Y. M. C. A. All have to do with that religious experience known as conversion and describe the changes in life and character wrought by this sudden realization of religious truth. Of these experiences, the author says they have been, "for the most part . . . violent upheavals in which the old ideas of life have been changed in the twinkling of an eye."

Five chapters on: The collapse of capitalistic government; The limitations of the judicial function; American courts as legislative chambers; The social equilibrium; Political courts; with a final chapter, Inferences, giving the author's conclusions make up this volume. The author's position is that "the social system, if it is to cohere, must be reorganized" and he writes, he says in his preface, "to express a deep conviction which is the result of more than twenty years of study and reflection upon this subject." The first chapter appeared in the "Atlantic monthly." The remaining chapters have not been previously published.

ADAMS, CHARLES FRANCIS. "Tis sixty years since." *75c (4½c) Macmillan 13-7586

This address was delivered by the author at the University of South Carolina on Founders' day, January 16, 1913. The sixty year period which he overlooks goes back to his entrance to Harvard university in 1853, and his purpose, as he states it, is "to compare the ideals and actualities of the present with the ideals, anticipations and dreams of a past now somewhat remote." Starting with a review of the questions of public polity that were the burning questions of the period of his youth—slavery, state sovereignty, free trade and protection—he traces the changes in public attitude toward them, finding that of the principles "then advanced as indisputable, few to-day meet with general acceptance."

"The address is full of vital interest and illuminating interpretation."

ADAMS, EDWARD FRANCIS. Inhumanity of socialism. *$1 (7½c) Elder 13-17686

The book contains two papers, The case against socialism, and A critique of socialism. The author defines socialism as "a habit of mind which becomes fixed in a certain number of each generation." He is opposed to socialism "because of its inhumanity; because it saps the vitality of the human race which has no vitality to spare; . . . because it stops enterprise, promotes laziness, exalts inefficiency, inspires hatred, checks production, assures waste and instills into the souls of the unfortunate and the weak hopes impossible of fruition whose inevitable blasting will add to the bitterness of their lot." ADAMS, SAMUEL HOPKINS. Health master.
12 *$1.35 (1½c) Houghton 13-23853

A book that cannot be classed as fiction, tho it is cast in that form. The health master is a doctor who engages himself to the family of a moderately rich man after the manner of the Chinese physician, whose duty is to keep his patients well rather than to concern himself with them only in sickness. Clean milk, fresh air, the care of contagious diseases, adenoids, cancer, and colds are some of the matters which he handles and on which he gives plain, common-sense advice. In one most interesting chapter he teaches an unattractive young woman how to be beautiful. The final chapter, Plain talk, is a discussion of sex education in relation to the social evil and its resulting diseases.

"The subject he writes about is vital and more than interesting, it should make his book a 'best seller.' If it does not Mr. Adams will have at any rate the satisfaction of having had his say for once and of having said it just as he wanted to. That gives his book its snap."

ADLER, ALPHONSE ANDREW. Theory of en-
4 gineering drawing. ll *$2 Van Nostrand 12-24850

"Descriptive geometry, the subject matter of the book at hand, has been presented in numerous textbooks in ways very similar. . . . The usual practice is to start with a set of definitions, to consider in detail the orthographic projection of a point, and then, on the foundation thus laid, to build the theory of the projection of lines, surfaces and solids. In this volume the order of presentation is reversed, and the reader is asked to consider first some concrete object—a box, for instance—the study of which furnishes material of use in the later discussion of its bounding surfaces and lines. The book is divided into four parts. Part 1 treats of oblique and orthographic projections, Part 2 contains a variety of problems on the subjects treated in Part 1, Part 3 considers perspective projection, and Part 4 the pictorial effects of illumination in projection drawings." Part 1 of this book appeared separately. (See Book Review Digest, Ja '13)

"It is of interest to note a departure from the trodden path, and particularly so as the author seems to have succeeded in presenting the subject in a clear and logical way. The treatise is prepared in such a way as to make the subject easily understood by the beginner. It will also serve as a handy reference book."

+ Elec World 61:366 F 15 '13 180w

"To present the descriptive geometry of oblique projection as an introduction to the study of the more usual orthographic variety seems certainly a reverse method of teaching. The style of the text throughout the book is occasionally loose and often involved, and the wording is less simple than is desirable in a book of this sort." R. R. Potter.

ALBEE, MRS. HELEN (RICKEY). Kingdom of two. il $1.50 (2½c) Macmillan 13-21123

The author of a number of gardening and out-of-door books calls this, her latest work, "a true romance of country life." And so it is, with descriptions of the kingdom and its rulers, and with special chapters devoted to the cow, the dog and other of its inhabitants. The kingdom is one of small acreage; its wealth consisting of stones and scenery; but for these deficiencies the "skyage" is said to compensate. The castle is of one story and of frame structure but the garden about it is truly royal. It is of the everyday life of this simple domain that the author writes in pleasantly discursive chapters.

ALDEN, WINTHROP, pseud. Lost million. $1.25 (1½c) Dodd 13-3754

In this enticing mystery story something new happens in every chapter and the real secret on which the working out of the plot depends remains unrevealed to the end. Young Lionel Kembell is drawn into the complication of affairs by a simple act of kindness in befriending a lonely old man on ship board. Later the old man, dying, intrusts to Kembell's care certain documents, and requests him to meet on a specified date a stranger who would appear wearing a red tie with a carnation in his buttonhole. The compliance with this request is the opening move in the game of chance in which Kembell finds himself engaged.

"The mystery is well introduced, and the characters well chosen, but the unravelling of the plot misses the excitement of the direct chase and falls rather flat before the book ends."

"The author writes with great directness and simplicity, he provides something startling in every chapter and never deviates into side paths and he keeps his readers puzzled to the end. ALEXANDER, MIRIAM. The ripple. II *$1.35 (1½c) Putnam 13-18002

An historical novel of the early eighteenth century with scenes laid in Ireland, France and Russia. One of the many schemes of Maurice of Saxony to place himself in power furnishes the basis for the plot of the story, and Dierdre, its heroine, is a young Irish girl who, having followed her brother to the continent, becomes closely involved in that scheme and its failure. Maurice, a man of many loves, becomes enamoured of Dierdre. She, in all innocence puts herself in his power and becomes the unwitting cause of the breaking of his betrothal with Anne Ivanovna, who was to have placed him on the throne of Russia. It is to save her good name that Dierdre's compatriot and kinsman, Rory Macgill-laciara marries her, and she rewards him after a long waiting, with her love.

"A meretricious historical romance. There are enough exciting incidents in the Irish heroine's career to satisfy the most exacting reader, but the intricate plot might have been unfolded with greater clearness, especially at the beginning."

 il *$1 (2½c) Bobbs 13-4762

There were many lovers in Skye—the little Kentucky village that perched high on the banks of the Ohio and looked over to the Indiana side of the river—but there were no engagements, no weddings, no christenings; for in every case in this community of "old families" a certain youth's family was not quite so aristocratic as that of the girl he loved or his career not quite sufficiently promising. So young lovers grew into old beaus and young maids into maiden ladies. Then in one April, under the influence of two young lovers who dared be reckless, Skye awakened, and many an old romance, long budded, came to full flower.

ALLEN, GARDNER WELD. Naval history of the American revolution. 2v il *$3 (2c) Houghton 13-9743

The author has prepared these two volumes in the belief that the naval side of the struggle for American independence has never been adequately treated. Every other phase of that conflict has been considered from many points of view, but "the maritime activities of the war excepting the more brilliant episodes, have been subjected to no such exhaustive inquiry." (Preface) In writing the history, therefore, the author has been able to make use of a large amount of material, hitherto only partly utilized. Volume one covers the period between the opening of the war and the end of the year 1778. Volume two treats of the events between 1779 and the close of the war.

"That several expeditions were sent out from the Virginia frontier into the hinterland has long been known, but the extent of the discovery has been in doubt. This dubiety the volume before us is intended to resolve. It proves that of the several English expeditions that set forth between the years 1650 and 1673, two at least reached westward-flowing waters, and established trade routes across the Allegheny mountains. . . . Meagre as the results of these English explorers appear, they themselves showed fortitude, hardihood, and a true zest for discovery; it is thus fitting that the records of their journeys should be gathered together and placed among our chronicles of western endeavor." The book is a record of Amundsen's peaceful and successful conquest of the South pole—a conquest due to careful calculation, forethought and good management. It was thru these qualities that he succeeded where those who tried before him failed. "Amundsen would be the first to acknowledge his indebtedness to his predecessor, to all his predecessors; but more is required than acquaintance with other men's mistakes. There was no guesswork under the Norwegian flag; every stress and pressure had been as carefully determined as though it had been for a bridge that was building; and a bridge it was, supported from depôt to depôt, from beacon to beacon, over which these men went so joyously and confidently to the Pole." (Preface) The nine chapters of the book are titled: The farmer of yesterday; The line of least resistance; The gleaners; The dry lands and the forests; The division of soils and the specialization of crops; The bookkeeping theory of soil fertility; The soil as an immovable asset; The evidence of history and research; Soil sanitation. "The material which is described in the volume falls into three classes—the Foreign and Foreign office papers, the Home and Home office papers, the Colonial office papers. By way of general introduction, the development of the office of secretary of state is traced and the history of the State paper office is outlined. . . . The bulk of the volume therefore—from page 78 to the close—is devoted to the Colonial papers. As an introduction to this Professor Andrews has prepared a comprehensive account of the Board of Trade especially from the point of view of the offices which it occupied, its establishment and official routine. Its connection with the committees and boards of control which preceded and followed it and with the office of secretary of state has also been briefly described. . . . Finally, a key to the Colonial office papers has been carefully prepared and printed at the close of the report. In his attack on present day educational methods the author has in mind the English system. His theories are applied exclusively to conditions as they exist in England. English system is "the giving to 'the poor' of a fairly good education, because fairly practical and up-to-date, and to those of nominal-ly greater advantages and opportunities an education which at hardly any point touches on or leads to the realities of life. . . . The school as Mr. Andrews would have it is a place where pupils go to learn, not to be taught. . . . and his ideal of discipline is that which could be maintained without any effort at all by a man whom a boy, out of his own pocket money, had hired to convey to him the art of riding the bicycle." "Peter Martyr was one of the most notable of the many Italians who took up their residence in Spain in the sixteenth century. He played a very important part at the courts of Ferdinand and Charles V. He was a priest, finally an abbot, a courtier, a diplomatist and ambassador, a soldier, a man of letters, and a scholar." (Sat R)

"It bears comparison with the translation of Mr. Gaffarel, which Mr. MacNutt himself has justly qualified as admirable. Like the venerable dean of the University of Marseilles, Mr. MacNutt knows his subject thoroughly, and, like him, he has, combined with careful accuracy, that simplicity and lucidity of expression which renders easy and agreeable the reading of the most replete works, among the number of which is the 'De orbe novo.' From the point of view of the translation, there is therefore nothing to improve upon in this last work of our author. As regards the distribution of the subjects, we cannot see why the chapters have no titles. There might also be said something with reference to the notes. The bibliographical indications also leave something to be desired. These criticisms are not very serious and leave to the work all its value." H: Vignaud.

The story, told in the form of a diary, of a young girl's journey from Illinois to New Mexico over the old Santa Fé trail. old literature of herbals. The active life-period of this literature extends over a course of two hundred years, beginning in the latter part of the fifteenth and ending during the second half of the seventeenth century. These curious old books treat of the medicinal virtues of plants and herbs, and were written chiefly by physicians for their own convenience and the use of the public at a time when botany was still a branch of medicine. If he dwells at some length on the private character of Lawrence, his justification is contained in the question 'What wart of a man's character does not affect his creative powers?' . . . No painter can put more into his work than he has in his own character, and the instability which wrecked Lawrence's love-affairs with Sally and Maria Siddons undermined and weakened his real aesthetic gifts."—Ath

"On first opening this well-illustrated volume, one is inclined to regret that Sir Walter Armstrong has devoted his fine critical perceptions to an artist who, after all, is only third rate. As one reads the mood changes, Lawrence's stereotyped uniformity as a portrait painter has been a challenge to the critic's adroitness. In short, Sir Walter seems to justify Sainte-Beuve's predilection for a minor personality as the best subject for criticism."

+ Nation 97:86 J1 24 '13 1000w

"With great care Sir Walter has compiled an alphabetical catalogue of Lawrences, dividing them up into classes, and when possible giving them a date. The only objection to this plan is that no painter paints in alphabetical order, and, though such an arrangement is excellent for one sort of reference, it in no way helps us to an orderly knowledge of the artist's development. Chronological arrangement is the more satisfactory method. The text bears no relation to the plate that happens to face it, nor are the plates dated. In this way a clear impression of Lawrence's development from his Reynolds manner onwards to his distinctly Laurentian is difficult to get. One other deficiency strikes us: the absence of illustrations of Lawrence's quite early Bath work. The most stimulating chapter is that in which lightly but surely Sir Walter Armstrong touches on Lawrence's contemporaries, of whom we are pretty ignorant."

(Engin N) In the first part of the book he presents equations for voltage generation, shows how magnetic circuits are proportioned and discusses armature circuits. "The last part of this section on direct-current machines describes the segregation of the several losses in machines and the tests for efficiency by power-loss measurements. It should be noted perhaps that a mathematical exposition of magnetic and electrical phenomena at first introduced the student to dynamo machinery. The rest of the volume (about 40 per cent) deals with alternating currents." (Engin N)

ARONSON, RUDOLPH. Theatrical and musical memoirs. il $2.75 (4½c) McBride, Nast & co. 13-2328

A book of very recent reminiscences for it covers the past thirty years in the dramatic and musical world. Wagner, Liszt, Strauss, and others figure in the early chapters telling of the author's student days. Paderewski, Josef Hofmann and more modern men come later. There is a chapter on The theatrical situation of today which discusses the question of the moving picture show, the matter of over production and superfluous theaters, and compares productions of the present with those of the past.

ASCHAFFENBURG, GUSTAV. Crime and its repression; tr. from the 2d German ed. by Adalbert Albrecht; with an editorial preface by Maurice Parmelee and an introd. by A. C. Train. (Modern criminal science ser.) $4 Little 13-15396

The author of this study of crime "differs from the Lombroso school in regard to the important question whether there is such a thing as a 'criminal born' type, while at the same time he recognizes and admits the part played by defective heredity in predisposing a certain proportion of mankind to yield readily to temptation. He rightly affirms, however, that the causation of criminality is essentially controllable, his studies leading him to emphasize alcohol and poverty as the chief social causes and mal-education as the great individual cause, with alcohol again conspicuous by reason of its influence as a factor in causing inherited defects. . . . The question of punishment is, of course, carefully considered, and indorsement given to the indeterminate sentence and parole system, with, during the period of enforced confinement, the employment of the prisoner in tasks which shall have an educational value to him."—Outlook

More fortunate that the majority of his fellow-correspondents, Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett was an eye-witness to the battle of Lule Burgas. "On the critical day, October 30th, he watched the fight from some rising ground in the centre of the Turkish front, close to the spot occupied by Abdullah Pasha, the Commander-in-chief, and his staff. He is thus able to give an extremely clear account of the operations as a whole, and not merely details of the particular fighting in his own vicinity." (Spec) "If there remained any doubt on the subject, [he] makes it clear that the Turkish army was utterly unprepared for war. She believes him to be a rich man, but finds on reaching Ireland that he is a widower with two children and that his only worldly possession is a ruined castle. "Each of the sacred edifices is examined from the point of view of the constructor and, as the author puts it, connected with the main stream of architectural history. Mr. Atkinson considers the cathedrals by groups, in one of which he places the canons' churches, in another the monks' churches, in another the foundations of Henry VIII and in still another the new sees. In the first two groups, which are his main groups, he arranges his cathedrals topographically, his purpose being to associate edifices which are closely allied in the technicalities of design. . . . Mr. Atkinson's book has twenty fine color pictures, reproducing drawings by Walter Dexter, and twenty pictures in monotone; it also carries forty-eight plans."—N Y Times

Hilliard Atteridge, in 'The bravest of the brave.'"—Nation

"In spite of the labour it must have cost, this book 'falls between two stools.' It cannot pretend to be an adequate account of part of the Napoleonic wars; yet, taken simply as a popular biography, it keeps its proper subject altogether too unremittently subordinate to military detail, so that we fail to realize

AUSTEN-LEIGH, WILLIAM, and AUSTEN-LEIGH, RICHARD ARTHUR. Jane Austen; her life and letters. il *$3 Dutton (Eng ed A13-1614)

The first memoir of Jane Austen which appeared in 1870, was the work of her nephew, J. E. Austen-Leigh. It is by the son and grandson of that author that the present work has been prepared. They have used the original memoir as a basis but have added new material. The letters cover a period of twenty years, from the time of Jane Austen's young womanhood to her death at the early age of forty-one.

"Their work is well written and authoritative; their care and industry are unbounded; and the result is a book which should be in the hands of everybody who cherishes the immortal maker of Mrs. Norris, Miss Bates, and Mr. Collins. The authors allow themselves a few remarks on the novels, but nothing lengthy in the way of literary criticism. That, perhaps, has been amply done elsewhere, but we regret that they did not apply their zeal and discretion to a summary of Jane Austen's character. At the end they add an admirable bibliography."

 1 *$1.35 (1½c) Benziger 12-25462

A story of Christian martyrdom in the days of Julian the Apostate. Faustula, the little daughter of a brilliant, cynical, pleasure-loving Roman patrician comes under Christian influence when as a little girl she becomes the playmate of the children of a Christian household; but it is not until later after she is bound by the vow of a vestal that she recognizes herself as a believer in the Christian faith. The horrible death reserved for those who desecrate their vows is meted out to her and her miraculous escape is effected thru the efforts of Fabian, the old playmate of her childhood, now her lover.

"The heartless sceptic might be moved to smile at this romance of decadent Rome, for Mr. Ayscough deals in miracles, and scoffers may assert that he domesticates the divine. Nevertheless, there is much to be said for this attempt to present a frankly unhistorical picture of Roman life. Mr. Ayscough achieves a happy ending in spite of every obstacle. The Vatican, the Pantheon and the Coliseum, Cortona, Pæstum, Salerno, Amalfi, Ancona, Viterbo, Syracuse are some of the places described in this book on Italy. In addition to the descriptions of the places “many quaint and little known legends of the saints are told and short, sympathetic biographical sketches are given of St. Thomas Aquinas, Fra Angelico, Leo XIII, St. Francis Xavier, St. Nicholas and other historical persons.” (Boston Transcript) “The author is a fervent Catholic; his descriptions of the ceremonies in the Vatican, of notable churches in Rome and of places with religious associations in other parts of Italy are written from a different point of view than is taken by most travellers who write their impressions.” (N Y Sun)

BABBITT, IRVING. Masters of modern French criticism. *$2.50 (2½c) Houghton 13-298

This critical work by the eminent professor of French literature in Harvard university is a protest against the “Rousseauistic democracy” or “pseudo-democracy” that would “value a book not by its appeal to the keen sighted few, but by its immediate effect on the average man.” Madame de Staël, Joubert, Chateaubriand, Sainte-Beuve, Scherer, Taine, Renan, Brunetière, are the critics of whom he writes. Accepting Matthew Arnold’s statement to the effect that the main effort of the literature of France and Germany, as of the intellect of Europe in general, has been, for many years a critical effort, he believes that “to study Sainte-Beuve and the other leading French critics of the nineteenth century is to get very close to the intellectual centre of the century.”

“It is refreshing by contrast with the narrow view of criticism which stifles us for all Professor Saintsbury’s learning, taste, and exuberance in his massive history, to open a book which, from a most comprehensive survey of the brilliant men who have done more than any other nation or age for criticism, ramifies in a set of doctrines which shape for us, at least in outline a theory of conduct, a theory of education, a philosophy, along with a theory of criticism. There is much more restraint in ‘The masters of modern French criticism’ than in the earlier volumes. But there is still, with an irony more restrained, a feverish quickstep that arises from almost an excess of earnestness.” H. E. Cory.

Still less will he find elsewhere a presentation of the subject through the medium of so admirable a series of portraits. But least of all will one find elsewhere such a penetrating analysis of the influence of modern criticism for good and evil on literature and on the intellectual welfare of the age.”

“Prof. Babbitt seems to feel very much at home among labels and definitions; his method consists largely of placing with infinite shades of difference, which, however, remain merely definitional. It is hard to see how such a method can be very helpful to anyone who does not happen to share the writer’s predilections and pet aversions, and the whole dry analysis (not at all dryly written) is too much criticism after the fact to be of first-hand value. Prof. Babbitt, with all his scholarship and his thorough acquaintance with critical literature, seems to lack anything like first-hand critical intuition. One of the ideal requirements that Prof. Babbitt makes of the perfect critic is philosophic training and background. But it is just here that he himself shows the gravest deficiency.” Alfred Kuttner.

BABSON, ROGER WARD. Future of the working classes. 50c (7c) Babson's statistical organization

A little book of "economic facts for employers and wage earners" based on a series of lectures delivered by the author in London and Paris during the spring of 1913. Increases in wages won by strikes or other forceful means are of no ultimate benefit to the working classes for an immediate rise in prices counteracts the gain. Only thru increased efficiency can the laborer better himself. To education therefore the author looks for the solution of class difficulties and differences.

This book is "chiefly an account of what produced the outbreak in 1910, together with the story of the revolutions that followed. It contains a mass of detail in regard to the present tangled state of affairs in Mexico. At the same time, it develops clearly the main outlines of Mexican history since the deposition of Diaz. The so-called English friendship for Italy consists more, the author thinks, of "an aes-

His book therefore is not addressed to the aesthetic and artistic reader, to the historian, or to the traveler. It is intended for the average man, who, while possessing a fairly accurate knowledge of the Italy of the past, is filled with misconceptions regarding the character of the modern Italians. + A L A Bkl 9:361 My '13

"Writing with an excellent sense of style and point, Mr. Bailey has produced at once an agreeable and a just view of Johnson and Boswell. BAIN, FRANCIS WILLIAM. Bubbles of the foam. Il *$1.25 Putnam 12-27851

"In his latest 'translation from the Sanskrit' Mr. Bain illustrates the Hindu doctrine of retribution for the sins of former incarnations." (Ath.) He tells the story of the mortal life of Kama, god of love, and Sarasvati, goddess of wisdom, who were condemned to an earthly reincarnation. "He becomes a wanton prince, she a forest maiden; she gives herself up to him, after a while is discarded and returns to the forest to die. A lover whom she rejected loves her through all, avenges her wrongs and is censured by the higher gods for his interference." (N Y Sun)

"This impassioned and exquisitely worded story, slight though it be, is charged with a power of taking readers through a world as highly imagined, in its way, as Maeterlinck's."

+ Ath 1912, 2: 414 O 12 50w

"Judged simply as a story, this is one of the best of the series. Yet, despite the beauty of the whole, there is much in the volume that seems non-Indian; in fact, distinctly Occidental. The phraseology lacks in great part the subtle Sanskrit flavor that marks the earlier volumes of the series, though genuine bits of Indian simile are frequent. But the most serious criticism centres in Babru. To the Occidental he is very attractive, but—he is a woodman; and unless the 'Churning of the ocean of time' is tinged with Buddhism, though it is uncompromisingly orthodox and Calvite in tone, such a drawing is almost impossible for a low-caste character."

"The average reader knows little about the little republic that was once known as the Kingdom of Portugal, for its larger neighbor, Spain, seemed to have monopolized all there was in romance and reality that is interesting. . . . There is much to be seen in the land and its cities, and there is much to be learned from the legendary and authentic history of Portugal which increases the interest in the land, and written so recently as was this book—since the abdication of Manuel and the establishing of the republic—there is a 'news' value to such a work."—Boston Transcript

BAKER, ELIZABETH. Chains: a play in four acts. *75c (4½c) Luce, J: W.

A young English clerk is fired with the spirit of adventure; the ambition to follow the example of an unmarried friend who is getting ready to go out to Australia animates him. But he has given "hostages to fortune," and family ties hold him to office desk and suburban apartment. Two contrasting woman characters are Lily, the wife, who holds him back and Maggie, the sister-in-law, who encourages him to go.

"It is pathetic, a little sordid in the defeated ambition, but it is characteristic and vital drama of contemporary English life." W. S. B.

BAKER, ERNEST ALBERT. Guide to the best fiction in English. *$6 (1½c) Macmillan (Eng ed 13-16912)

A new edition of an English work first published in 1903. Features of the new edition, which has been much enlarged and thoroly revised, are the inclusion of matters of interest to the special student (data relating to Celtic fiction, Greek and Latin romances, the Icelandic sagas, etc.); the grouping of all works written in English, with the exception of American fiction, in one section, forming the main list; the bringing of the lists down nearer to date (Dec. 31, 1911). In the notes the aim has been to "subordinate criticism to description." An index of authors, titles and subjects, prepared by the compiler's wife and daughter, is an invaluable feature. To W. Swan Sonnenschein is given the credit for information respecting publishers and prices.

single-handed. The present reviewer, for instance, finds some things which surprise him in Dr. Baker's summary of the classical romances. The index is an admirable piece of work with its cross-references and headings of subjects. On the whole, the book is likely to be very useful, and, when it has undergone thorough revision, should be invaluable. We have dealt mainly with omissions, but it is only fair to say that we have found a multitude of books for which we searched and which in some cases we hardly expected to find recorded."

"Like the dictionary, Dr. Baker's 'Guide' lacks coherence, but it is nevertheless extremely suggestive reading, its comments upon novels of every kind being especially apt and intimate. The knowledge that it displays of the many thousand novels included in its lists is little short of marvellous, and it is faithful alike in its description of obscure and of conspicuous works of fiction. In his analysis of the novels of Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, Fielding, Defoe and other classic writers, Dr. Baker displays no little skill at the saying of much in little." E. F. E.

His sons became millionaires; his grandsons multi-millionaires. To-day the Rothschild influence is of importance on every European Bourse. . . . The Rothschilds have, in a sense, grown rich at the expense of the countries in which they have lived, but they have never betrayed those countries, and several times have done them good service. BANCROFT, FRANCIS. Divided. Il $1.35 (lc)
" Small 13-25051

A house divided against itself with brother turned against brother is again the basis of a plot for a war-time novel. In this case the drama is played out against a background of South African veldt with Boer and Briton as actors. The two brothers George and Thane Brandon are young men of British descent who were born in the Transvaal. It is their home; its people are their friends. George has married the daughter of one of their Boer neighbors. Then comes the war with England, and some inherited instinct calls to them to stand by their blood-brothers of another land. In the hour of decision their ways separate and the end for both is tragedy. The story has its brighter touch, however, in the final reward of happiness that comes to Margery Brandon, their loyal, self-sacrificing sister.

"The story is not well rounded out, and there are far too many loose ends. It does not start out to be merely the love story of Margery, so that when it ends with only that part of the plot finished, the reader feels unsatisfied."

BARCLAY, MRS. FLORENCE LOUISA
12 (CHARLESWORTH). Broken halo. il $1.35
(1c) Putnam 13-21707

An incident in the hero's childhood gives the story its title, and thruout the narrative the broken halo stands as a symbol of the wreck of Richard Cameron's religious belief. It is his attachment to the little white lady, a woman many years older than himself, who comes to him as a patient, and her gentle influence which in the end lead him back to the way of faith. In a conventional sense the story has no love interest, for the devotion between these two which ends in their marriage cannot be so termed.

"We have sought in vain the moral of this evidently moral story. 'The broken halo' will hardly, we imagine be read through by men. It appeals more to women of the author's outlook, who are legion. The critic cannot but inquire whether the literary taste of unemancipated Englishwomen has not degenerated, even in sentimental fiction; for Mrs. Barclay is inferior to Edna Lyall."

 (CHARLESWORTH). Upas tree. il $*1
 Putnam 12-25384

This new story by Mrs. Barclay which tells of an estrangement between husband and wife "turns on the coming of a child into the home, and ends with the softening and purifying influence of the childish presence. . . . The mind of the hero is unbalanced by contact with the poisonous upas tree in Africa, whither he has gone to secure a satisfactory setting for a new novel he is to write." (Ind.) The same "upas tree" stands in the story as a symbol of the selfishness in the man's character which leads him to put his work and his reputation above his duty to his wife. With the restoration of health there comes to him a realization of his shortcoming and a determination to root out from his heart the tree of selfishness that has poisoned his life.

It is intended to be a companion volume to Mr. Barr's book on 'Direct-current electrical engineering,' and is primarily intended for designing engineers, although it should prove very useful to any one desiring a more intimate knowledge of this subject. It does not, as the title would make one believe, cover the whole subject of alternating-current machinery, but merely alternators, transformers and rotary converters. These are, however, covered very comprehensively with an abundance of data and examples relating to the European design of such apparatus. The work is based on the author's "Electrical illuminating engineering" published in 1908 but is rewritten and much enlarged. The measurement and distribution of light with the underlying principles are the subjects of which it treats. "A considerable part of the book is made up of quotations and passages adapted from recent papers." (Science)

"The physical properties of light, color and radiation, photometers and photometry, illumination calculations and the principles of illumination are treated much more fully than in the earlier book, but special types of lamps are not touched on."

+ A L A Bkl 9:262 F '13

"Comparing this book to some of the others available on the same general subject it is seen that it is perhaps the most comprehensive of any now available (if we except two volumes of Johns Hopkins lectures), as it pursues the computations and theoretical discussions further than the rather more general works like Bell's 'Art of illumination,' or the descriptive and somewhat pictorial work by Cravath and Lingsingh, 'Practical illumination.'"

+ Engin N 69:1251 Je 12 '13 800w

"As a résumé of important articles of the last few years the work is useful, and its value is augmented by the care which has been taken to give references to the original authorities. The treatment of radiation which serves as an introduction to the book is characterized by a looseness of expression which can not fail to produce hazy ideas in the mind of the student. Even more serious are certain misstatements of fact. The book as a whole would have been much improved by a thorough editing, for in many passages the language is crude, to say the least. It is marred also by an unusual number of typographical errors. Nevertheless, in spite of the many weak points, it must be granted that Professor Barrows has collected a large amount of valuable material, and it is to be hoped that future editions will enable him to remedy defects both of form and of substance." BARTON, JAMES. Denys of Auxerre. *5s
2 Christophers, London A13-1253

portraits." "The old struggle between the pagan gods and the doctrines of Christianity is the underlying theme. . . . Denys by the power of his personal charm, has come to be considered as the genius of a new age, of which the emblem is a Roman wine flask, which was discovered enclosed in an old stone coffin. . . . Denys is more a symbol than an individual, an incarnate, intoxicating symbol of the joy of the world, rejuvenating mankind, but finally losing in a struggle with the power of the church." (Boston Transcript)

"The author has a vivid fancy, some gift for characterization, and sufficient command over metre, but he has allowed himself to be overcome by his literary culture. He very rarely speaks in his own language, but laboriously fabricates page after page of speeches and dialogue in alien tongues. He sinks under the weight of medievalism of matter and Elizabethanism of manner, and falls either to recreate the middle age as it was or (what might be as delightful) to create convincingly an age that never was."

"The characterization is very careful, and in the case of the monk Hermes we have an arresting and subtle portrait. BASHFORD, HENRY HOWARTH. Pity the poor blind. *$1.35 (2c) Holt 13-14821

The title is metaphorical; it refers to the blindness of soul of those who cannot see God. Two of the characters in the story are made to see. One is Thompson, an insincere young curate with a beautiful reading voice who wakes to a sense of his own shallowness when he learns that a young girl who has listened to him has taken him seriously; the other is the girl herself, Berenice Chote, a young pagan, unlettered and untaught in things spiritual. She is simple and her question is direct: "Do you know who God is?" He sets himself to find out.

"Mr. Bashford has a message to deliver, and he is an observer with a keen eye for human nature. His style is alternately humorous and biting satirical, though sometimes a little obscure; he has the gift of realistic description, but sometimes abuses it. His characters have individuality, and have been drawn with a sure, if somewhat ruthless touch, though they do not always strike us as representative types. The author has handicapped a thoughtful piece of work by his ultra-smartness and unnecessary frankness."

+ — Ath 1913,1:570 My 24 100w

"This novel has an uncommon literary quality and interest. The plot is of the simplest, moving as directly and ending as inevitably as that of some old Greek play; making a story whose appeal, save to those who also 'having eyes see not' must be as compelling as its theme is original."

BEACH, REX ELLINGWOOD. Iron trail. 11 *$1.35 Harper 13-18006

In this story Rex Beach returns to the scene of his first successes and gives us another tale of Alaska filled with love and adventure and accounts of a big enterprise. The building of a railroad from the coast into the interior is the business which occupies Murray O'Neill, a man who has known Alaska from the time of the first gold stampede. Dan Appleton comes north as his chief engineer. Natalie Gerard comes with her mother and step-father, a rascally promoter, and Eliza Appleton comes to represent her paper and write up a series of articles that will expose certain nefarious schemes then in operation. These four form the group of characters who carry out the story's action.

BEARD, CHARLES AUSTIN. American city government. 11 *$2 (1½c) Century 12-27210

"The scheme of Professor Beard's book is the recapitulation of the progressive movement so far as it affects the cities of the United States. He has brought together the steps taken by many cities under various heads of the governmental activities, such as the raising of money and its expenditure, the safeguarding of the issue of franchises and the collection of the remuneration, the various sanitary and building reforms, and so on for a long catalogue. The result is not a treatise on the theory of city government, but a systematic view of practical steps regardless of politics."—N Y Times

"This excellent review by an associate professor of Columbia, of the newer experiments in municipal democracy, is distinguished from Munro and most other books on the subject by its emphasis on the social and economic functions of city government, with which more than two thirds of the volume is occupied. The material has been carefully prepared and is presented in an interesting and attractive way for students and citizens rather than for experts in municipal affairs."

+ A L A Bkl 9:276 Mr '13

"The chief criticism that may be made against the book is that the recent progress in municipal affairs is attributed, perhaps too much, to these valuable progressive devices and not enough to the increasing realization of the nature of city problems and to the growing public spirit on the part of many men who desire efficiency, honesty, and justice in municipal activities. In addition, any discussion of the abuses to which the recall is subject and of the practical failure of socialistic methods where they have had some opportunity for application is omitted. The book is, however, an excellent summary of present conditions and tendencies in American municipal life, and is constructive in its proposals for further improvement." R. G. Gettell.

The author is a California woman who was one of the workers for women's enfranchisement in that state. The new voters whom she has particularly in mind are the women of her state, and other new suffrage states, but new voters of the other two classes—young citizens who have just reached the age of twenty-one, and newly naturalized foreigners—will profit by a reading of her little handbook. BECKFORD, WILLIAM. Episodes of Vathek; 1 tr. by Sir Frank T. Marzials; with an intro. by Lewis Melville. *$5 Lippincott
(Eng ed 13-1857)

These "Episodes" now published for the first time one hundred and twenty-five years after they were written were planned by their author as a part of the original romance "Vathek" which appeared in 1787. Their omission was due to the act of the English translator in hurrying his work into publication without them. "They relate the evil lives which brought their narrators at last into that horrible Hall of Eblis, to the torment of the flaming hearts, which formed the climax of the original tale and the triumph of the author's lurid imagination. . . . All three tales reflect the morbid character of the author." (Ath)

In fairness, however, it must be added that they inculcate the strictest morality and may be safely intrusted to the young. Sir Frank Marzials is responsible for the translation, which is admirably done. The French original is included as an appendix, and, finally, the volume itself is a joy to behold, for seldom in these degenerate days do we come across an example of the printer's art as beautiful as this is." M. A. R.

"It may be said of Beckford's stories that they possess all the same qualities as 'Vathek' itself, for they are no less richly imaginative, extravagantly humorous, and unpleasantly sensuous. The descriptive power is perhaps their most astonishing feature; and it is only a certain heaviness of touch that makes them obviously inferior to the 'Arabian nights.'"

BELL, MARGARET VAN HORN (DWIGHT).

d. by Max Farrand. *$1 (5½c) Yale
univ press 12-25270

The author of this journal, a daughter of Maurice William Dwight, niece of President Timothy Dwight of Yale, and great granddaughter of Jonathan Edwards, took the journey, the events of which are here recorded, in 1810, traveling by wagon from New Haven, Conn. to Warren, Ohio. The journal was kept that it might be sent in place of letters to a much loved cousin in the east and it has therefore all the sprightliness and naturalness of intimate correspondence in place of the usual stilted self-consciousness of a diary.

"Is addition to the enjoyment afforded by the writer's shrewd humor and delightful lack of self-consciousness the little volume is a valuable addition to the social history of the period and the region."

BENDA, JULIEN. Yoke of pity (L'ordination); tr. from the French by Gilbert Cannan. *$1 (3c) Holt 13-17156

This is a translation of a much talked of French work, "L'ordination." The central character of the story is a thinker of high order who is held back from achieving his highest development by ties of affection and domesticity. The story is told in two parts, between which the connection is not close. In part one Felix is pictured as wearied of the liaison with his mistress but held to her by the bonds of pity. In part two he appears as a husband and father, held back from high achievement by his feeling for his little daughter who falls incurably ill. The book has aroused much adverse criticism in France and in an "author's note" M. Benda makes answer to some of the critics.

+ — Ath 1913,2:157 Ag 16 230w

"If M. Benda wished to write a philosophical essay or to formulate his views upon the Bergsonian philosophy, he should have done so straightforwardly and not have attempted to make a novel of them. [The book] contains neither the heart nor the soul of fiction. The very perfection of its style and manner stirs the reader to antagonism. He will not allow the writer to deceive him into thinking he is reading a story, or to fool him with the idea that here are human beings thinking and acting independently of their creator." E. F. E.

BENJAMIN, LEWIS S. (LEWIS MELVILLE, pseud.). Life and letters of William Cobbett in England and America. 2v 11 *$10 Lane 13-3678

This biography, largely based on new information, relates the career of one who "started in life the uneducated son of a peasant-farmer, and by sheer determination became one of the most potent factors in English political life." In turn this Englishman who lived a century ago served as soldier, teacher, writer, publisher and member of Parliament, even experiencing imprisonment and exile to the United States because of politics. Nearly a third of the work consists of letters some of which "contain nothing but matters of business; others are of the nature of political manifestoes; one of the best is a little treatise on education; and there are some charming family letters of the parlour and tea-table variety." (Ath)

"His book is a supplement to the standard biographies, while Huish, full though he is of material which could hardly be collected from any other source, is to a great extent superseded. We have noticed only three slips. The bibliography of first editions is full, and a great advance on anything of the kind which has been attempted previously. But we have some serious faults to find. The book is deficient in notes, and some of the letters are dull or unintelligible for want of them."

"Mr. Melville has given us in this volume a complete and interesting biography of a remarkable man, distinguished, as Macaulay says, by his parts, his dissoluteness, and his versatility. Parts he undoubtedly had in a sufficiency to bring him to the front in any company. . . . No attempt at covering up in secrecy his dissolute life was ever made . . . while his versatility is as clearly shown in his politics as in his literary work. Born to great wealth and station, he had but two things to ask of the Government, a dukedom and the Garter; and he died at the age of 33 a pauper in a Spanish convent."—Ath

BENSON, ALLAN LOUIS. Truth about socialism. *$1 (2c) Huebsch 13-9162

A book written by a socialist for non-socialists. It is addressed not so much to the active opponents of socialism as to the workers who are indifferent or who do not see in it a remedy for their wrongs. The chapters are headed: What socialism is and why it is; The virtuous grafters; Why socialists preach discontent; How the people may acquire the trusts; The "private property" bogey man; Socialism the lone foe of war; Why socialists oppose radical politicians; The truth about the coal question; Deathbeds and dividends; If not socialism—what?

BENSON, ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER. Thy rod

¹ and Thy staff. *$1.50 (3½c) Putnam 12-24943

Mr. Benson's latest work follows "The silent isle" and recounts the failure of the experiment described in that book. To retire from the world while yet in the prime of life, to have no other business than his writing, to see only the friends he liked and to enjoy solitude, was the substance of his program. A nervous breakdown of two years duration resulted from the experiment. In this book he tells how there developed from his suffering "a conviction that the real part of himself remained impregnable in the midst of the phantasmagory. He was 'assured of the permanence of his soul.' A little more, and it was borne in upon him that the soul and God were the two indestructible realities. He knew at last what that threadbare old theological word 'regeneration' meant, and the joy of life was his as it had never been before." (N Y Times)

"What is lamentable about this habit of drugging himself with introspection is that it is spoiling Mr. Benson's talents. If he could bring himself to the effort of writing about a subject, about some definite thing external to himself, he might be less popular, but he would write something better worth reading, something that would strengthen his self-respect and the respect of those who regard him as a serious man of letters, and especially a critic."

bridge Don who marries and thru sorrow and human experience enters into a wider kingdom. It is not a story of action but the reflective reader will find the simple tale absorbing in itself.

"We are sorry we cannot accord a more hearty welcome to Mr. Benson on his entrance into the ranks of fiction. We feel he is only using the medium for the purpose of giving a fresh public his views on life. Consequently the characters themselves do not grip us."

"To read a book by Mr. A. C. Benson, after a course of garish modern novels, is like coming into a sanctuary. Few writers have such perfect repose, or are capable of creating such an atmosphere of intense quiet. There is something almost cloistral about it. Viewed as a novel, Mr. Benson's book cannot be accounted wholly as a success. There is too little incident, insufficient inter-action of character. The main interest lies in tracing the subtle workings of Howard's mind, his spiritual and mental growth."

Into this very pleasant story of English life, one villainous character enters. But he, a connoisseur of the arts who exploits young talent to his own advantage, meets his just downfall at the hands of two of his victims, and is in no wise allowed to dim the joyous brightness of the tale. The love story, of the idyllic type, is very pleasing, but it will be the happy relationship between two sons and a mother which will most endear the book to the heart of a sympathetic reader; one is glad that it is a picture of "The artist's mother" that brings Charles Latham fame.

BENSON, EDWARD FREDERIC. Weaker vessel. *$1.35 (1c) Dodd 13-3812

The story of a girl of quick mind and strong character, brought up in a country parsonage, who marries a rising young playwright and finds an opening for her own unusual talent on the stage. Shortly after her marriage she learns that her husband's brilliant work can be done only with the aid of stimulants; that his primarily weak character is deteriorating still further under their use; and that he is incapable even of fidelity to her. Then she, nominally the weaker vessel, finds that she must support his instability with her strength. She accepts the task with unwavering determination, and whatever there is of manliness in her husband's character is preserved thru her courage and devotion.

"The theme is one of far-reaching and deep possibilities, and we regret that so practised a novelist should have treated it in a comparatively superficial manner. Details of characterization are over-insisted on, and much is dragged in which makes the book overlong."

"To make perfect the illusion of real life should be the novelist's goal. In Mr. Benson's latest book, and especially in 'The weaker vessel,' there is absolutely no illusion. The plot, the characters, the incidents, the dialogue, are all ingeniously clever and the product of a master-hand at fiction writing, but they are never for a moment anything but artifice. They leave us cold. We read on and on, and we are moved only by a sense of the novelist's technical skill. In all that he writes, however, he is interesting, even when he allows his desire for intricate mental analysis and his passion for prolixity to obscure his sense of reality. He is, in any event, a novelist who can see and understand life, even if he is not able to give it the verisimilitude of fiction." E. F. E.

He always writes with charm and finish, and his avoidance of the inessential is positively glaring, it is so brilliant. "Mr. Benson's average man, when a clerk in the city, gives his thoughts and spare time, first to philandering, and then to an emotional turn towards Catholicism. When his parents come into a fortune he becomes a snob, an apostate in religion and a renegade in love." (Ath) "It is necessary to read the story before the reader can appreciate how Father Benson is able to glorify his church out of such externally discouraging events. BENSON, ROBERT HUGH. Come rack! come rope! *$1.35 (1c) Dodd 12-29473

A story of the religious controversy that made sixteenth century England a period of rack and torture, written from the Catholic point of view. The heroism of the priesthood is the author's theme and the story itself is concerned with the life and martyrdom of one of their number, Robin Audrey, a likeable lad, awakened to a sense of responsibility by the apostasy of his father, who weakly accepts the faith of Elizabeth to escape the fines imposed on Catholics. Leaving his home and renouncing his love the boy goes to Rheims to prepare for the priesthood, returns to England, becomes involved in the plots to restore Mary Stuart, is taken prisoner and suffers a martyr's death.

"A vivid picture of the period, and very well written, but unpleasantly realistic in detailing the methods of torture."

BERESFORD, JOHN DAVYS. World of wom-

 caulay co. 13-13964

An England from which men have largely been eliminated is the scene of Mr. Beresford's story. A suddenly appearing plague spreading from China to Russia and thence across Europe practically wipes out the male population, leaving the women to reorganize society. The order that results is by no means a paradise, but certain revered conventions become obsolete. Money loses its value, so do titles, houses and fine raiment, and at the close when it is discovered that an appreciable number of men still exist in the world men and women are ready to start over together on a better level of equality and with a clearer perception of what each must contribute to their common civilization.

"It will be perceived that Mr. Beresford owes something to Mr. H. G. Wells, but he easily liquidates the debt, and while he reasons a little less closely, and hardly possesses that author's grasp of detail, his work is sincere and thoughtful, and deserves a hearing. We cannot associate ourselves with all his opinions, and in places the book might have been better written: some of the dialogue in the earlier part is noticeably stilted, but as a whole it is exhilarating."

Granting its initial premise, the sudden destruction of practically all the men of a country, and of large numbers of the women, the story is remorselessly truthful and logical. BERGSON, HENRI LOUIS. Introduction to metaphysics; tr. by T. E. Hulme. *75c
 (4½c) Putnam 12-26704

Bergson published in the "Revue de métaphysique et de morale" of January, 1903, an essay entitled "Introduction à la métaphysique." This now appears in two English translations, the first bearing the title "Introduction to metaphysics," translated by T. E. Hulme and published by G. P. Putnam's Sons. The second is called "Introduction to a new philosophy," translated by Sidney Littman and published by John W. Luce and Company. The first has the authorization of M. Bergson. "In this essay [Professor Bergson] develops the fundamental principles of his intuitive metaphysics; for example, that duration cannot be put into static conceptions, that the whole is simpler than its parts and that our comprehension of reality is symbolic and therefore inadequate." (Ind)

BERKMAN, ALEXANDER. Prison memoirs of an anarchist. Il $1.50 Mother Earth pub.
 A13-1296

At the time of the steel strike at Homestead, Pa., in 1892, the author of this book, then a young man of 21, was arrested for the attempted murder of Henry C. Frick. He served fourteen years of the twenty-two year sentence imposed on him, and in this book, which is in part a defence of the doctrines of anarchy, he sets forth a scathing arraignment of prison methods, based on his fourteen years' experience. "He brings suit against the whole penal system, the life to which, in any penitentiary, a prisoner is condemned. Prison existence, he declares, is the death sentence of strength and of citizenship. It destroys a man's health; it breaks down his moral fibre; in one wretched case after another it robs men of sanity." (N Y Times)

"While a great part of this book is mere rhetorical trash, it contains matter of the utmost value in regard to the unspeakable brutality, graft and immorality that prevail in the average penal institution."

+ — Ind 74:258 Ja 30 '13 500w

"That the author of 'Prison memoirs' has written with entire daring is patent, but that his daring has defeated its own ends is quite as plain. As a 'human document' Alexander Berkman's book is vivid, candid, honest. Here and there, too, are touches of sweetness, flowers of human fineness not altogether lost in the prison air. 'Prison memoirs of an anarchist' would be the better for a pruning, in the interests not of moral sensibility, but of force. But its story remains with us, nevertheless, unforgettable."

+ — N Y Times 17: 672 N 17 '12 950w

"The book discloses its author as a writer of talent, a worthy disciple of the Russian realistic school. The author has doubtless indulged in some romancing, by virtue of poetic license, but in effect the story rings terribly true. It is a serious indictment of modern prison theories and practice. As an exposition and defense of anarchism the book is by no means so successful."

+ — Springfield Republican p 5 N 21 '12 600w

"This book ought to be, but will not be, widely read. One would as soon court a nightmare as to voluntarily go through this chamber of horrors. The moral lesson derived from the reading of the book is that our whole criminal system must be reformed out of existence and a curative method be substituted for the present method of punishment." BERNHARDI, FRIEDRICH VON. Germany and the next war; tr. by Allen H. Powles. 1l *$3 Longmans (Eng ed War12-220)

"General von Bernhardt does not merely produce a book in praise of war; he deliberately advocates not only preparation for war, but also war itself. . . . He writes from the standpoint of one who thinks that aspirations for peace threaten to poison the soil of the German people. He tries to prove that war is not only a necessary element in the life of the nations, but also an indispensable feature of culture, in which civilized nations find the highest expression of strength and vitality." (Ath) He predicts naval wars between England and Germany and between England and the United States.

Ath 1912,2:447 O 19 50w

"It would be an easy task to take the heads of some of General von Bernhardt's arguments and knock them together. He does not hesitate to exaggerate the dangers which beset Germany."

— Ath 1912,2:513 N 2 800w

"General von Bernhardt's book is at this distance a piece of academic thunder, whatever it may mean to the timorous in England. Still, even at this safer distance the book brings a real interest, in so far as it reflects the attitude of a typical German toward his country and its future."

+ — Boston Transcript p4 F 1 '13 550w

"Gen. Bernhardt's appeal to his countrymen contains the usual amount of biological and economic nonsense, not unmixed, we submit, with fantastic military strategy."

— Nation 96:130 F 6 '13 700w

"Unfortunately the author does, in a sense, count, or we should ignore the book. We cannot praise the translation which has made the author's meaning obscure in certain passages. The historical and philosophical portions of the work are inaccurate and misleading, but the purely military chapters which close the volume are worthy of attention. Those on organization, education and training, and the preparation for war, whether we agree with them or not, must compel our respect as the outcome of the experience of an intellectual and capable officer to whom we should listen when he sticks to his last. It is only when he writes about missions and world empires that he loses his head."

+ — Sat R 114:sup711 D 7 '12 1300w

"The coolness with which the author assumes his views to be true, without argument or evidence, takes one's breath away. The book is remarkable chiefly for this, that it is an unforgettable assertion of the German principle that war is an instrument of policy."

BEROLZHEIMER, FRITZ. World's legal philosophies; tr. from the German by Rachel Szold Jastrow; with an introd. by Sir J. MacDonald and Albert Kocourek. (Modern legal philosophy ser., 2) $4.25 Boston bk. 12-23105

"The present volume is a comprehensive, historical review of world philosophies, treated from the special viewpoint of juristic thought. No significant theoretical tendency is neglected from that revealed in the earliest civilization of the Orient to the generalizations of recent economic, sociological and general evolutionary philosophers and schools." (Ann Am Acad) The author "presupposes an acquaintance with the main facts of the history of philosophy, and the principal technical terms employed by philosophers; but he does not aim at a complete review of all previous thought." (Am Pol Sci R)

"The work is imbued with the spirit of the old-fashioned 'laissez faire' school, although in the edition from which the translation was done a few concessions have been made to the modern spirit of social solidarity. The present stage of capitalism, with its tendency towards combination and monopoly, seems to be quite unknown to the writer. In other ways the work has the earmarks of superannuation." Ernest Bruncken.

+ — Am Pol Sci R 7:145 F '13 500w

"The treatment is somewhat insular in its emphasis on German thought; but this is so catholic and so representative of varying tendencies that one would have great difficulty in finding a better outline history of thought than is to be found here. There is little effort at interpretation; and the almost endless array of topics treated gives rise to a tantalizing brevity of treatment in individual instances. But, after all, these are only defects of a comprehensiveness that will stimulate readers to deeper research."

"Professor Betts discusses three of the major problems of rural education: the social organization and relationships of the rural school, the curriculum, and the quality of the teaching. . . . He discusses the need of a community social center and the possibility of using the rural school for this purpose. The advantages of consolidation on both the social and instructional sides are presented, and the financial problems discussed. He shows the meager, antiquated character of the rural-school curriculum and the crying need of modernization and adaptation to rural conditions. . . . In the last chapter, he portrays the inefficient character of the teaching in the rural schools, the inadequacy of the training, the salaries, and the supervision. BIGGERS, EARL DERR. Seven keys to Baldpate. il *$1.30 (2c) Bobbs 13-3762

Baldpate is an inn, perched high and lonely on a mountain side. In summer it is a scene of gayety; in winter it stands desolate and deserted. But there are seven keys opening seven of the Baldpate doors which, in various ways, come into the possession of seven people who, for various reasons, desire solitude; and they all seek it, by means of the keys in their possession, during the same week in December. First among these solitude-seekers is the young novelist, who, having won a popular reputation by the writing of melodrama, desires to escape from all thought of the adventurous, only to find himself plunged into real melodrama of the most exciting order.

BINGHAM, HIRAM. Monroe doctrine: an obsolescent shibboleth. $1.15 Yale univ. press. 13-20757

In this essay, expanded from an article in the "Atlantic monthly," the author has attempted "to sketch the growth of the Monroe doctrine, to indicate the obligations and disadvantages it entails, and, more particularly, to portray the attitude toward it, and toward us, of our neighbors to the south." (Preface) Because of their remarkable development, the author holds that the time has come for us to abandon our attitude of patronizing tutelage toward these advancing republics and adopt a new policy of cooperation. "From the unselfish point of view, and from the point of view of the world's peace and happiness, there seems to be no question that the Monroe doctrine is no longer worth while."

"This 'running account of Maeterlinck's works,' as the writer points out, is nowhere very strong in biographical detail. Yet an apology was hardly necessary. For Maeterlinck reaches his highest when he lives outside himself, and, since he so often shares this loftiness of outlook with the elect, it is the part of such a book as this to determine how far these heights are his true abiding place. It is a gradual and we think, a complete progression which Prof. BitHELL reveals. He has gone to many sources for information, and even for criticism. BLAND, JOHN OTWAY PERCY. Recent² events and present policies in China. il $4 Lippincott 13-136

A new book on the Chinese situation by one of the joint authors of "China under the empress dowager." "The conviction of the author which underlies all his argument is that the cause of the revolution was not a direct or burning desire to rid the country of the Manchu dynasty. The fall of the Manchus was almost an accident in a general movement of unrest of which the conditions were economic, moral, and educational, but mainly economic. . . . Mr. Bland thinks it still possible that a monarchy will be restored." (Spec) "He disbelieved profoundly in the ability of the Chinese people to manage their affairs through the machinery and methods of representative democracy. . . . The inherent and radical difficulty . . . is that there is no public opinion in China with regard to public affairs, and can be none. The great mass of the Chinese neither know nor care about government except as it immediately affects their narrow lives, and by intellectual and temperamental limitations are quite unable truly to understand how their lives are affected." (N Y Times)

"One of the most illuminating, as well as the most readable of the many recent works on China."

"It would have greater worth if the British author did not give so one-sided an account of the Chinese revolution and the establishment of the republic. Evidently the book was written during the revolution, for now that the republic has been peaceably maintained for over a year its pessimistic view cannot be justified."

+ — Ind 74:699 Mr 27 '13 850w

"Mr. Bland's creditable career entitles his views to respectful examination. They are advanced with ability, but they are supported almost entirely by his personal observation and remain, after all, personal opinions the value of which can only be tested by time. If they are accepted in this country as a reason for condemning a valiant if quixotic effort of China's young enthusiasts to rescue their nation from the fate of ancient Babylonia, they may do some harm."

Two books written apropos of the Chinese revolution are certain to run to some extent on similar lines; but the Chinese problem has many facets, and Mr. Kent has been concerned rather to write history, while Mr. Bland has been interested in analysing the situation. So that they practically complement each other without overlapping."

"No matter how repellent Mr. Bland's statements may be at times, his book is fortified with apparent historical fact and compels respect both for its scholarly preparation and for the author's unusual detachment and perspective. Writing as he was in the face of a flood of visionary and impractical literature which overaccentuated the modernizing changes which have taken place, Mr. Bland has perhaps gone too far in discounting what has already occurred. Yet with this criticism, his book is one of the most important yet produced upon present-day China."

BLASCO IBAÑEZ, VICENTE. Sónnica; tr. by Frances Douglas. *$1.25 Duffield 12-25324

A story of ancient Saguntum, the city of southern Spain that fell under the attack of Hannibal at the beginning of the second Punic war. The heroine of the story, Sónnica, is a courtesan, who, as the widow of a merchant, is the richest woman of the city. With her lover, Actæon, an Athenian who arrives on one of her ships, she perishes when the city falls. "This concise outline is historical. Ibañez fills in the epic story with no end of sumptuous and voluptuous details." (Boston Transcript)

"It is like a succession of word-paintings by a poetic and licentious Makart. It is certainly not a book to be recommended to a Sunday school library; it should be kept sedulously out of the hands of the young person, for though it undoubtedly paints accurately the nameless orgies of Greco-Celtiberian life in a city devoted to the cult of Aphrodite, it is hectic and miasmatically unwholesome and it ends with a scene of slaughter worthy of a pre-Shakespearean dramatist. It is wonderfully realistic, wonderfully recreated—but was it worth doing? We doubt it."

BLAUVELT, MARY TAYLOR. Solitude letters. *$1.30 (2½c) Sherman, French & Co. 12-25602

A series of letters, written during a summer vacation, by a woman who thru the school year is a teacher of girls, to an intimate woman friend. "What I read about, think about and dream about I will write to you," she says in her first letter; so in the letters that follow she does write of books and men and things, of ideals and aspirations. Friendship, marriage, intellectual fellowship, work, the education of girls, are favorite themes with her. She quotes at times from A. C. Benson, and in some of her letters—especially those touching on educational ideals—there is a tone that is reminiscent of the "Upton letters."

"Tranquil, clear and very sane, the letters interpret honestly the experiences of an ordinary life and will be found interesting and helpful by women readers who face life from the same standpoint or who live and work under similar conditions."

The most fascinating chapters in the book, however, are the ones on 'that blameless gentleman,' Sir Joshua Reynolds; the other on 'Count Reinhard, a German in the service of the French' in the time of the dauntless Napoleon, which somehow recalls Pater's 'Imaginary portraits.'" "The purpose of this book is to present a course of instruction in mechanical drawing for first-year students in engineering schools, and for those who wish to prepare themselves to do commercial drafting. The principles and methods outlined have been in constant use for a number of years in Sibley college, Cornell university, and are stated to have produced most satisfactory results. Much attention is given to free-hand lettering and sketching, and to isometric drawing and sketching. Forty-six pages are devoted to drafting-room practice; and 33 pages to the selection, care and use of instruments and materials."—Indust Engin

BLIGH, STANLEY M. Ability to converse. *70c Oxford A13-707

Conversation, which the author defines as "the oral interchange of observations, sentiments, ideas, or theories" may be divided "into seven possible classes according to the intents of the participants: the anecdotal, the personal, the scientific, the political, the aesthetic, the ethical, and the spiritual planes. A chapter is given to each one of these and they are discussed and illustrated in detail. Six remaining chapters treat of things important to conversation; emotional conditions, social environment, the exertion of influence, the ability to listen, conversational associates; and finally, a chapter is given to the young and inexperienced." (Boston Transcript)

"The book is small enough to slip into a pocket with ease, but full of suggestive hints. Some of his points are disputable, but his good sense throughout is conspicuous."

BLOUNT, JAMES HENDERSON. American occupation of the Philippines, 1898-1912. Il *$4 Putnam 12-17477

A work which presents a strongly anti-imperialist view of the American policy in Philippine government. The author who spent six years in the islands, two as army officer, four as a district judge, writes from intense personal convictions. He believes that the establishment of self government would be an act of both justice and expediency. "He condemns America's conquest in Asia, and remarks we should stop running a kindergarten for adults in Asia, and get back to the Monroe doctrine. These reflections follow on a careful and detailed account of the occupation of the Philippines, including that decisive event, the capture of Aguinaldo." (Lit D)

"The spirit of the work in general is unpleasantly and unnecessarily vindictive, and many of its statements are injudicial, but it will find an interested audience among thoughtful readers, specially those who question our Philippine policy."

+ — A L A Bkl 9: 94 N '12

"It is unfortunate that Judge Blount with his intimate knowledge of the war period of our colonial government was unable to withstand the pressure of partisan politics, and has therefore spoiled what might have been a good history of an important period of our national life, in order to produce a controversial book that is of doubtful value to the cause for which it was written." O. G. Jones.

— + Am Pol Sci R 7:308 My '13 700w

— Ind 74:650 Mr 20 '13 700w

"Judge Blount practically ignores the large and very real participation in self-government which the Filipinos have today. A large part of the book is devoted to a rather tedious account of military operations and pacification measures. There is needless repetition throughout. The author assures us a dozen times and over that he does not know 'how to draw an indictment against a whole people.' The style of the book is loose, personal, and militant, but nevertheless interesting."

BODLEY, JOHN EDWARD COURTENAY. Cardinal Manning; The decay of idealism in France; The Institute of France: three essays. *$3 Longmans 13-1184

The title essay is an appreciation of Cardinal Manning's character; "In the other two papers Mr. Bodley returns once again to the subject which he has made his own. The first, on 'The decay of idealism in France' (he is not speaking as a philosopher), is critical, while the other, on 'The French Institute,' is historical." (Sat R)

"We do not think that Mr. Bodley is altogether fair to Newman, whom he styles 'the most attractive and the most colossal egoist that ever lived.' At the same time, in view of the nature of Purcell's biography, it is matter for rejoicing that this carefully considered essay should come to us from one who knew Manning intimately, and has many qualifications for an impartial judgment. Moreover, Mr. Bodley's insight into Manning's mind seems to us on the whole unerring. We admire the width and minuteness of his survey [in 'The decay of idealism in France,'] however we may differ from his general interpretation." André Chevillon.

13-18475

Evelyn Drake, a widow in the early thirties, chronicles in this book the annals of a New York lodging house. Evelyn, on her modest income, leads, in a way, a double life. On the one hand she is one with the humble people with whom she lives, the struggling painter, the little model—"artist, not cloak"—and the aspiring opera singer, Lizzie Harris. On the other hand she ascends at times into the world of Betty Ferguson and Mrs. Ashworth who stand for the rich and the aristocratic in New York society. The amusingly ironical situation in which these society friends attempt to "take up" Lizzie Harris nearly turns to tragedy when Roger Clement, the one man who counts for Evelyn, almost falls in love with her. But his disillusionment comes in time; Lizzie goes joyously on her way to fame, leaving Evelyn to happiness.

"Prof. Bonney describes in his usually clear style the way in which rain and rivers act on the surface of the land. The examples of their action are drawn mostly from personal observation, many being taken from the Alps, and they are described with more freshness than is common in a textbook." (Ath.) Alice is too timid to withstand this maternal force, and refuses the gallant and manly young Guibert, whom she loves. . . . BOSANQUET BERNARD. Value and destiny of the individual. *$3.25 Macmillan 13-6278

This work embodies the Gifford lectures for 1912 and is a continuation of the volume of lectures for 1912 published with the title, "The principle of individuality and value." The problems that are dealt with are, to a large extent, those that are commonly summed up by means of the terms, God, Freedom, and Immortality; but the way in which these conceptions are regarded is very different from that which might be expected by any reader who has not placed himself at the central point of view. The question about God, for instance, is not whether God exists, or how God should properly be conceived, but rather what is the part that the conception of God plays in the emancipation of man from his narrow self-centered existence. And it is in a similar way that the other problems are discussed." (Int J Ethics)

"It is a moving plot that Miss Bowen has chosen as the basis of her romance. She has written with emotional strength, and with a keen sense that enables her to visualise its varied and changing scenes. "Marjorie Bowen would be well advised to forsake, for a time at least, the periods she finds most attractive, and endeavour to gain or regain some sort of touch with reality. A leaning towards theatricality is one of the weaknesses which detract from her obvious capability for depicting a scene. The author is quite clever in accumulating the elements of tragedy, but an excessive sentimentality prevents her reaping the advantage she has legitimately gained. The total absence of humour one must deplore, but cannot hope to remedy, since the lack of it seems constitutional. She offers us merely a costume play which can only appeal to those who are equally indifferent to reality."

BOWEN, ROBERT ADGER. Uncharted seas. il *$1.35 (1½c) Small 13-6770

The scene of this story is a small Carolina village; its heroine is Theodosia Berrisford, a girl brought up in an unnatural seclusion by her mother. To this out-of-the-way place comes Madame Carola, an opera singer of world-wide fame, and Theodosia, in defiance of her mother's wishes and to the shocked indignation of the whole village, which looks on the stranger with distrust, makes friends with her. The singer's coming makes a great change in the girl's life, and later developments reveal secrets which change her relationship to the woman she has thought to be her mother and unite her with Madame Carola.

BOWER, B. M., pseud. The gringos. il *$1.25 (1½c) Little 13-23414

Altho this is a story of California of the '49 period, it is little concerned with the craze for gold. Most of the scenes are laid on the ranch of a Spanish grandee who contests with the United States government the title to his land. Two young Americans are taken on as riders on his ranch and are given the freedom of his hospitable home. Both fall victim to the charm of their host's daughter, the lovely Señorita Teresa. For a time Jack, the younger and more dashing attractive of the two, seems to be the accepted lover. But he incurs the enmity of Don José, a Mexican who also loves the girl, and finds himself precipitated into a duel, of which the heartless señorita approves. At its end, when Jack, having his enemy at his mercy, grants him his life, both young Americans, convinced of the girl's shallowness, are content to ride away.

"The love story is not quite of the usual order and is well told."

A story of a Montana ranch and of a man's hard fight on the uphill road to manliness. Ford Campbell wakes one morning from a drunken sleep, faintly remembering that the night before he had been married to someone, but who she was and where she went after the sudden ceremony, he does not know. The solving of this mystery is one of the matters with which the story is concerned; the other is Ford's regeneration as a result of certain new influences that come into his life.

BOYES, JOHN EDWARD. White king in East Africa; ed. by C. W. L. Bulpett. il *$3 (4c) McBride, Nast & co.

"He was not a real king, but he was the actual controlling power for several years in a great region into which before his time no white man had been permitted to enter." (N Y Times) He was an English lad who ran away to sea on a fishing vessel at thirteen, and who shipped for his first long sea voyage at fifteen. He began to trade with the natives on the east coast of Africa in 1898, and, largely because other white men told him not to, ventured into the interior of the country where no man had gone before. He made friends with the natives, ingratiated himself into favor with their chief and became, in all but name, king over a territory of a half-million population. All this he tells in a straightforward, readable narrative.

"The main point in which this book fails to be classed with 'Treasure island' and 'Robinson Crusoe' lies in the fact that it is not a work of imagination, but is absolutely true. It will be read with absorbing interest, and will be classed as one in the foremost rank of works of adventure."

The author's purpose is to describe the London as it has served for a background for works of English literature from the time of Chaucer to the present day. "His opening chapter deals with London as it was in the days of the Canterbury pilgrimages, and then follow successive accounts of Shakespeare's London, of Milton's London, and of the English metropolis when Dryden, Addison, Johnson, Lamb, Byron and Dickens flourished. The closing chapters are descriptive of Victorian London and the London of today. viewed and set off against one another; but the fact is emphasized that organized speculation is, comparatively speaking, a recent development, and the idea is broached that by cultivating it as a necessary part of the competitive system it may reform not only itself, but other misunderstood commercial factors as well." Mr. Deane's text generally has been adopted and his notes are quoted freely. Worthington Chauncey Ford has edited the work and has given copious explanatory notes and citations. "In an introduction of ninety pages Dr. Brehaut gives a clear and well-written account of what is known of Isidore of Seville, of the spirit of the age in which he lived, and of the works he wrote. This introduction is followed by the core of the volume, the discussion of Isidore's 'Etymologies' which forms the basis of the dissertation. This is not a translation of the 'Etymologies' as a whole; on the contrary, after a brief introduction and analysis of each book of the original, there follow extracts selected with much judgment and translated in a masterly way."—Am Hist R

BRICKER, GARLAND ARMOR. Solving the country church problem. il *$1.25 (2c) West Meth bk 13-21319

This book is "the product of the experience of fifteen rural leaders and social engineers, men who are 'doing things' for community up-building in the belief that the country church will be restored to its former position of commanding influence in rural life only when it sets before itself a community ideal as well as a church ideal, both of them to be worked for with methods and equipments adapted to twentieth century conditions." (Boston Transcript) Among the problems discussed are: The economic relations of the farmer and his church; The centralization of country churches; Efficiency and leadership; An adequate salary for the rural pastor; Recreations and the rural church; The work of women's organizations in the rural church.

"This book is inspirational as well as practical, because it glows with faith and fervor—faith in the old full-orbed possibilities of country life for the country people themselves, faith in the rich opportunities of Christian service for the man of the country ministry; inspirational also because it reveals what has actually been accomplished in numerous specific instances by old-fashioned religion in combination with new-fashioned church methods."

The author applies the method of historical criticism to the three Christian creeds—the Apostles', the Nicene and the Athanasian. Part one, making up the larger part of the volume, is devoted to the Apostles' creed, considered article by article, a chapter being given to each. In part two the Nicene creed is studied in like manner, with briefer attention in the final chapters to the Athanasian creed. The author has attempted to explain these creeds "in accordance with scientific principles of interpretation in the light of Holy Scriptures upon which they are based, and of the writings of the Christian fathers of the time of their composition." (Preface)

"In a treatment of the origin, history, and interpretation of the Apostles' and Nicene creeds Professor Briggs presents from the Episcopalian point of view the doctrinal basis of a reunion of the Christian churches. BROOKS, JOHN GRAHAM. American syndicalism: the I. W. W. *$1.25 (1½c) Macmillan 13-6283

This book, by the author of "The social unrest" offers an able interpretation of the manifestation of syndicalism in America. The author makes a sound plea for a better understanding of the movement, and makes it clear that to look upon its members and to deal with them as a crowd of "bums" will be a fatal error. Its relation to the socialist and trade union movements and to the general syndicalist movement of Europe are pointed out.

"Mr. Brooks has produced a volume which the intelligent student of labor problems will read through with increasing interest and respect." R. F. Hoxie.

BROOKS, SYDNEY. Aspects of the Irish question. *$1.50 (2½c) Luce, J: W.

(Eng Ed W13-6)

The author, while an ardent advocate of Home rule, still treats the subject dispassionately, and is able to look at the Irish question from many sides. "He has no illusions about the nationalist caucus, the present-day Irishman's weaknesses, and the equivocal position of the priesthood in relation to the Home rule movement. Though he recognizes the beneficent material effects of Sir Horace Plunkett's campaign, and the Unionist attempt to 'kill Home rule by kindness,' he retains his enthusiasm for Home rule, for the sake both of English politics and the Irish national character. . . . The present bill he criticizes severely as a makeshift which does not give the Irish parliament anything like full colonial powers; but he thinks it will inevitably lead to something more." (Ath)

BROWN, ALICE. Robin Hood's barn. Il *$1.25 (3½c) Macmillan 13-20347

A pretty story in which dreams buried in old letters are made to come true by a persistent and reverent later generation. Aunt Adelaide, the wife of a stock market gambler, marooned in her big country home, dares to carry on a correspondence with a writer of note, who, with her, conceives of a scheme for building houses, guest houses, homes where tired folks could be entertained, could get rested and learn to be of good cheer. This haven was to be called "Robin Hood's barn—all outdoors." The scheme ended in the dream. Years later, it was realized thru the sale of the author's letters—Aunt Adelaide's being withheld.

BROWN, PETER HUME. Youth of Goethe.
11 *$2.50 Dutton (Eng ed A13-2048)

While the book will not be an epoch making one for the scholar and adds but little material to the vast amount already extant, it presents clearly and entertainingly the story of the poet's early years, endeavoring to analyze his nature, environment, and mode of life, in their relation to his development, both then and in later years." (N Y Times) "The materials of this volume are drawn in the main from the poet's own autobiography, and from that most attractive collection of Goethe's writings, letters, and conversations in these early years, 'Der junge Goethe,' which was published nearly forty years ago by Michael Bernays, and has recently been re-edited in six volumes by Dr. Max Morris." (Ath)

"In view of the admitted tendency of past criticism to bathe Goethe's youth in too roseate a light, we ought perhaps to regard a book like the present as a healthy corrective. We cannot help thinking that, if Prof. Hume Brown had been in closer touch with what the continent has been doing and thinking about Goethe in recent years, it would have added to the breadth and finality of his work. This is particularly noticeable on the side of literary criticism; we miss here those wider glimpses which help us to see Goethe in the general perspective of the eighteenth century."

BROWN, WILLIAM JETHRO. Underlying principles of modern legislation. *10s 6d Murray, John, London 12-8497

The author's thesis is that "one fundamental principle has underlain legislation in England during the last hundred years—a principle deeper than the antagonisms of parties or the differences of political schools. This single dominating influence or ideal which unconsciously rather than consciously has given unity to the laws of modern England is declared to be that of liberty. . . . The careful analysis of modern legislation which follows is of undoubted value in interpreting, from this single point of view, the legislative activity of modern times. . . . In a concluding chapter entitled 'The outlook,' the problems of today and tomorrow are considered, the trust, unemployment, the non-living wage, and the protection of the child receiving especial attention."—Am Pol Sci R said enough to show the breadth of the subjects touched on and the wide reading of the author, as well as the fact that his ground is highly controversial. If we have ventured to criticize, we have done so in no merely carping spirit. The ultimate chapter entitled 'The outlook,' leaves us with the impression of having spent some profitable hours with an honest searcher after truth."

BRYCE, JAMES. South America: observations and impressions. 1l *$2.50 (1½c) Macmillan 12-22020

Descriptive note in December, 1912.

"Nowhere else in English will be found a series of observations and impressions so accurate, so profound, or so instructive. At the same time the reviewer must dissent strongly from some of the statements regarding the lack of intellectual, scientific, and artistic progress in Latin America. It is to be regretted that his incidental treatment of Spanish-American history has been derived, it would seem, mainly from reading the conventional misrepresentation of Spanish rule. Had he made use of a treatise like Bourne's 'Spain in America,' he could not have condemned the Spanish colonial system in so sweepingly a dogmatic fashion (p. 16). As a result of this unfamiliarity with the sources of Spanish-American history, numerous errors have crept into the work." W: R. Shepherd.

BUCHANAN, ALFRED. Modern Héloïse. *$1.25 (1c) Dillingham 13-114

A problem novel with an inaptly chosen title, for this modern woman bears no resemblance to the earlier heroine. She is beloved by a scholar but gives no self-sacrificing devotion in return. The question of heredity enters into the story but its problem is essentially that of the uncongenial marriage in which the man desires freedom, while the woman, of Puritanic principles, refuses to break the conventional bonds that bind the two together.

"Although Mr. Buchanan has made his ideas convincing enough to set us thinking and probably to bring the accusation from some people of being immoral, he has not embodied his theories into a thoroughly effective story."

It is here that she meets Mr. Jack Markham who promptly falls in love with her altho he is already tacitly engaged to his cousin, Mary Markham. Fifteen sketches of North Africa which, with the exception of one, have appeared in the "Outlook." He attempts to reveal the sources of the mysterious fascination of the country—a fascination elusive and haunting to sojourners there, and one that lures back to its witchery the traveler who has once come under its spell and gone hence.

"The territory covered by these cathedral studies or descriptions is a vast one proportionately, so thickly is it studded with great cathedrals or other ministers, and to attempt adequate description is to court failure from the start. But Mr. Bumpus does not do this. He omits mention of some great edifices altogether, summarizes careful description of others, and devotes especial attention to cathedrals typical in character, or which are characterized by situation, or, again, which enable us to perceive more clearly the distinctive features in others that differentiate French from English cathedrals. Among cathedrals entitled rightfully to

BUNAU-VARILLA, PHILIPPE. Panama: the creation, destruction and resurrection. 11 *12s 6d Constable & co., London 13-13132

The author, a French engineer connected with the canal from 1884-1906, "writes as an actor who has taken a decisive part in the developments and vicissitudes of the last thirty years or so; indeed, if one accepts the view of the book, the conclusion must be arrived at that without the author's untiring vigilance and permanent and unerring intervention there would be no Panama canal at all. . . . The avowed aim of the book is: 'to explain how that great conception of French genius, the junction of the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, was snatched from her; and that the solution of the problem of the opening of a Free Strait between the two oceans was her work and hers alone.'" (Sat R)

"His book is full of sensational headings and sensational accounts of work at Panama, and his own share in that work. He writes in a boastful way; but it must be remembered that he is often on his defence."

+ — Ath 1913,1:586 My 31 350w

"It is not exactly modest autobiography. The tone of it now and again suggests the immortal Cyrano de Bergerac of M. Bunau-Varilla's plea for his plan to make the canal 'the Straits of Panama,' that is to say, to bring it down to the sea level, is the most fascinating part of his book. The story of the Panaman revolution, the secession from Colombia, the plots and the counter-plots on the Isthmus, and the action of the United States government is written minutely and with great freedom and vigor of characterization."

BUNKER, JANE. Diamond cut diamond. 11 *$1.25 (1½c) Bobbs 13-19934

A story of many mysteries in which "a spinner entirely devoid of romantic notions has a rôle that would severely strain the nerves of a man accustomed to mysteries, guns and sensations of all sorts, but she moves calmly along, working during the few quiet intervals of her ten days of melodrama, on her new book, 'Belgian byways.' All the time she has concealed in her stocking—and she never put anything extraneous there before—or somewhere in her flat, a million dollars worth of blood-red diamonds." (Boston Transcript) She doesn't know whose diamonds they are but she enters into the spirit of the game valiantly, resolved to save them at any cost.

BURGESS, GELETT. Love in a hurry. 11 *$1.25 Bobbs 13-19076

A merry tale, which we learn by looking at the dedication, has been termed by the author a "scherzo variation of an old theme." The theme—and it is old—is that of the young man who will inherit a million if he marry within a prescribed time. The time limit in this case is some fourteen hours and in his frantic efforts to claim the million Hall Bonistelle, artist-photographer, proposes to three women at once and is accepted by all of them. Fortunately for him the presiding genius of his studio, Miss Flodie Fisher takes a hand and a marriage for love alone, with the million incidentally thrown in, is the happy result.

"With its cleverly conceived and tellingly handled situations, 'Love in a hurry' would make a most passable farce and we should not be sorry to see it on the stage." R. T. P.

BURNS, REV. JAMES ALOYSIUS. Growth and development of the Catholic school system in the United States. *$1.75 (2c) Benziger 12-22334

In an earlier volume the author traced the history of the first stage of development of the Catholic school system in this country. Beginning where that work left off, with the great increase in immigration about the year 1840, he now follows out the history of the second period. He has attempted to bring into relief the two essential features that mark this period—the growth of the system to meet the rapidly increasing Catholic population, and its inner development toward a higher degree of perfection. "It is the author's hope that the present volume, like the preceding one, may interest non-Catholic as well as Catholic students of education." (Preface)

"The book is well written. Its tone is scholarly and impartial; its assertions are buttressed by facts and references to original sources. At times one has a sense of being hurried over the numerous details of a vast field, but the careful student will find in the many footnotes guides to a more detailed study of most of the topics."

A volume of lyric verse by a young poet whose name is known thru her contributions to various magazines. BUTLER, SAMUEL. Note-books of Samuel Butler; selections arr. and ed. by H: Festing Jones. *$2 Kennerley (Eng ed 13-13382)

Mr. Jones, the editor of these note books, who is at work on a complete biography of Butler, writes for the present volume a preface and a Biographical statement. The Note-books "contain the day-by-day jottings of their writer on a multitude of subjects, many being strongly reminiscent of the satiric spirit of 'Erewhon' and 'The way of all flesh.'" (Boston Transcript) They "supply a free and intimate exposition of his thoughts from day to day, the judgments, jokes and incidents, and touches of character that he regarded as worth preserving. . . . Besides the 'Note-books' there is a section of poems, some unpublished, and ll worth attention." (Ath)

"The 'Note-books' as published contain a certain amount of trivial matter, but nearly every page has an arresting comment, perhaps, something which the whole world is thinking, but is too timid or conventional to utter. The reader who does not find in these pages something either to instruct him or irritate him to good purpose had better relapse on 'Friends in council' or 'Guesses at truth,' where he will find a mild complacency and about as much divine discontent as the average man wants."

BYRON, MAY. Wind on the heath. *$1 Doran

Of the poems that stand out with distinction in this collection there are two types—the gypsy songs and the ballads of the sea. "The song of the tinker," "Gypsy mother-songs" and "The gypsy taint" have the true Romany color, and there is the roll of the sea and the breath of salt wind in "A ballad of London river," "The pageant of seamen" and "A ballad of famous ships."

"Her poetry deserves something more than a perfunctory acknowledgment; it is individual with a kind of emotional abandonment that finds a lure in the open world. Miss Byron writes with a man's vigor of a man's world; there is an exciting and nervous fibre in verse that celebrates the deeds and characters that have in them the breath and romance of the sea." CAINE, HALL. Woman thou gavest me. *$1.35
10 (1/2c) Lippincott 13-16787

Hall Caine's latest story is a highly emotional tale, told in the first person by Mary O'Neill, its heroine, with occasional interpolated notes by Martin Conrad, her lover. Mary's girlhood is spent on the isle of Ellan, and in the early scenes the story resembles "The deemster" and other Manx tales; in its later development, however, it takes on the coloring of Mr. Caine's later books; an indictment of the Catholic church in its attitude toward divorce being the chief motif. Mary, married to the profligate Lord Raa, turns to her old lover, Martin Conrad. Their child is born in the London slums while Martin, an explorer, is in the Antarctic. Mary is saved from starvation and worse by his return but she inconsistently refuses to marry him, believing herself, in spite of a legal divorce, still bound to Lord Raa.

"Mr. Caine states that the incidents of this compound of religious fervor and sensuality are drawn from life, and that he has dealt with the coarser side of married life and the subject of divorce with the best of intentions. But it takes more than crudely transcribed facts and some very worthy intentions to create a good piece of fiction. The abstract position of an unhappily married woman in its relation to the law and the church presents many possibilities, but in connection with the characters of Mr. Caine's novel the serious aspect of the problem becomes mawkish and loses any claim to the attention of the intelligent reader. The book is made up of seventeen sermons selected from those preached by Dr. Campbell during his recent visit to America. The sermons are all notable for their highly spiritual quality. A partial list of contents follows: Conquering prayer; The elder brother; The hidden God; The nature of divine fatherhood; God pursuing the soul; The sense of the eternal; The poor in spirit; The Christ of the newer criticism; The price of the soul.

"These seventeen sermons will not disappoint those who have read the earlier collections. They show a deeply religious spirit and a profoundly religious insight, and the speaker's belief in the doctrines of historical Christianity is everywhere evident."

CANBY, HENRY SEIDEL. Study of the short story. *$1 (1c) Holt 13-2577

The author presents a brief study of the short story in English and American literature. Beginning with a chapter on the Medieval short story, he traces the development of this form of literary art down to the present day, devoting one chapter each to Bret Harte, Henry James, Stevenson, and Kipling, and concluding with a chapter on The contemporary short story. This history is followed by eleven illustrative stories. The book is intended, the author states, as a substitute for "The short story," published in 1902.

"A clear, compact and trustworthy text for serious students."

CANNAN, GILBERT. Round the corner. *$1.35
 (1½c) Appleton A13-1873

A book for those who demand of a novel that it be in some measure a "criticism of life," not a mere "good story." It is at once a study in heredity and in the clash of conflicting temperaments that may be assembled under one roof in the members of one family—that of the Reverend Francis Folyat. There are eight Folyat children all of whom in various ways make failures of their lives. It is only Serge, the eldest son, who runs away as a boy to return a man and a philosopher who ever learns anything of the real meaning of life, and it is thru Serge that the father learns something of it too.

CARTER, HUNTLEY. New spirit in drama¹⁰ and art. $5 Kennerley

The author "offers 'an outline survey of Continental influences in drama and art,' especially as affecting the theatre in England. He pays much attention to 'the attempt to evolve a new type of theatre, a new stage and a new setting,' but he rightly considers this which is done before it is known what new form the drama is going to take, 'a proof that reformers are putting the cart before the horse as usual.' He himself believes that the English national drama will evolve into its finest possible form through 'a rhythmic conception of play, player, decoration and music.'"—Boston Transcript

"Mr. Carter is a clever and often witty writer. Indeed, he sometimes attempts a little too much burlesque. His English style just lacks distinction. He has no use for the delicate shades of meaning of words. But these slight defects can be easily corrected in another edition, and scarcely detract from the general charm of a lively book." N. H. D.

+ — Boston Transcript p18 Ag 20 '13 1100w

"Mr. Carter is in sympathy with the forward movement, and it is the warmth of this sympathy that urges his pen and frequently creates in him an almost profound insight into modern tendencies. If he errs in the estimate of details . . . his book still remains a most able attempt to recognise, amid much apparent confusion of aim, only 'one art' in the work of modern play-producers, picture-makers and ballet dancers."

+ — Int Studio 49:252 My '13 330w

"If Mr. Carter had the faintest respect for language, and a really clear idea of what he was trying to say, he would be in a position to make a serious contribution to the literature of criticism. He certainly has the knowledge. But unhappily his way of writing merely bemuses the lay-reader. He deliberately chooses to be the worst sort of critic, confusing the frontiers of the arts, and speaking in metaphor at precisely the point where the plainest English is necessary."

CARTER, MARION HAMILTON. Woman with empty hands. $1 *50c (6c) Dodd 13-8397

The narrator of this experience—it is most patently a true story—is a southern woman, bred in the old school of chivalric ideals, who describes her evolution as a suffragette. Suffragists were to her the "shrieking sisterhood" until fate turned her out into the world, a woman bereft of home, husband and child, a woman with empty hands. It was the words, "We need you" addressed directly to her by a street orator that led her into the suffrage movement, for her own great need was to be needed by some one else.

"Adds nothing to the real arguments for equal suffrage but has interest as a confession of faith in the cause."

+ A L A Bkl 10:8 S '13

"This record of a woman's gradual conversion to the woman movement is an interesting and clever study in psychology, as well as a most useful bit of propaganda work. The story itself is well written and presents in a few words a series of vivid pictures, touched in very lightly, but with an unerring deftness of hand. Even for those readers whose views are antagonistic to the views of the author, there should be much that is illuminating and arresting in this story." Beatrice Harraden.

CATHER, WILLA SIBERT. O pioneers! *$1.25
9 (2c) Houghton 13-15167

The story opens in the period of some thirty years ago when the rich Nebraska prairies were still untamed, and the characters of the story are of the two races, Bohemian and Swede, who were then attempting to subdue the wild land. Of those who had faith in the land was Alexandra Bergson. At her father's death she takes charge of his farm, determined that his own faith in the country's future shall be vindicated. Against the wishes of her brothers she holds on to it, lives thru years of adversity, and sees prosperity come. Alexandra's romance is of the quiet type, but another love story, stormy and emotional lends a touch of the melodramatic to an otherwise peaceful idyl.

"Miss Cather has an unquestioned gift of observation, a keen eye for minute details and an instinctive perception of their relative significance. Every character and every incident in this slow-moving and frankly depressing tale give the impression of having been acquired directly through personal contact, and reproduced almost with the fidelity of a kodak picture or a graphonola record. And yet the net result strikes one, on second thought, as rather futile. The whole volume is loosely constructed, a series of separate scenes with so slight cohesion that a rude touch might almost be expected to shatter it." F. T. Cooper.

"The novel has great dramatic power; it is deep, thrilling, intense—and this intensity comes through the simplicity—one might almost say severity, of treatment. The reader, surfeited by the many-paragraphed conversations of the ordinary novel, finds his imagination unusually roused by the magnificent sufficiency of the book. The subject is not one which can be expressed in a pen and ink sketch; it needs the broad brush lines—and in such a way has Miss Cather treated it. Yet there is great delicacy of touch." E. U. S.

CATO, MARCUS PORCIUS, censorius. Roman farm management: the treatises of Cato and Varro done into English, with notes of modern instances, by a Virginia farmer [Fairfax Harrison]. *$2 (2½c) Macmillan 13-13061

Of the first treatise in this book, Cato's "De agricultura," the translator says that "though a mere collection of random notes, [it] sets forth more shrewd common sense and agricultural experience than it is possible to pack into the same number of English words." Of the second, Varro's "Rerum rusticarum libri tres," that this "treatise on farm management is the best practical book on the subject which has come down to us from antiquity. The real merit of Varro's book is that it is the well digested system of an experienced and successful farmer who has seen and practiced all that he records." CAWEIN, MADISON JULIUS. Poet, the fool and the faeries. *$1.50. Small. 12-26310

A lyrical eclogue, Mr. Cawein calls his first long poem, that which gives title to the volume. It is followed by a "one-act lyrical drama of ancient Greece," "The Dryads," and these two with a group of short lyrics and fairy songs make up the first part of the volume—a part devoted to pure nature poems and headed "The common earth." The poems of the second book, "Character and episode," are also inspired by the poet's love of nature yet in them there is the human touch which will give them a wider appeal.

"Mr. Cawein is not, as far as we know, a popular poet; his verses are not sought after by the newspapers, nor do they offer the combination of slanginess and sentiment which appeals to the host of readers who 'think' they like poetry without having the remotest notion of what it really is. But he has long been sure of his following among those whose judgment really counts, and for whom poetry—to

CHADWICK, HECTOR MUNRO. Heroic age. (Cambridge archaeological and ethnological ser.) il *$4 Putnam (Eng ed 13-13081)

This is a study "of a certain stage through which several Indo-European races seem to have passed, though at periods differing as widely as 1,500 years. Mr. Chadwick calls it the Heroic age, owing to the peculiar literature it has in each case produced, and the social conditions described in that literature." (Ath) "The first part of the book deals with the early heroic poetry and traditions of the Teutonic peoples, more especially with those stories which were the common property of various Teutonic peoples. The second part deals with Greek heroic poetry and traditions. In the third part attention has been called to the existence of a number of somewhat striking characteristics common to the two groups of poems and an attempt made to account for them." (Publisher's note)

"This important book is a careful and learned study. It is perhaps too exacting to expect him to cover the whole field, but when a comparative study is announced, we feel ourselves justified in demanding at least a page to tell us why a leading branch of the race [Latin] makes no figure in the book. When we come to the Celtic branch, the omission is even clearer."

+ — Ath 1912,1:369 Mr 30 1550w

"Obviously we cannot enter upon a detailed criticism, and it is with extreme reluctance that we record an opinion unsupported by evidence; but we feel that the results attained in the volume are by no means commensurate either with the reputation of the distinguished author or the amount of toil he has cheerfully lavished upon his project."

"This book must arrest the attention of students alike of Greek and of Teutonic life and literature. Opinions will differ as to some of the conclusions reached, and, more especially, as to the emphasis laid upon certain contributory factors which may seem to apply equally well to the genesis of other literary phenomena. But this is a question of detail. For the book as a whole, and for most of the details, students of literature have good reason to be grateful."

CHAMBERS, ROBERT WILLIAM. Business of life. *$1.40 (1c) Appleton 13-20349

The two leading characters in Mr. Chambers' latest story are a dissipated young clubman and a beautiful and highly gifted young girl who differs from other Chambers heroines in that she is a business woman, running an antique shop which she inherited from her father. She is an expert in the appraisal of arms and armour, and it is in cataloging the famous Desboro collection that she comes into the life of young Jim Desboro. Under her influence he is of course moved to forsake the idle course for a business career and to reform generally his way of life.

CHAMBERS, ROBERT WILLIAM. Gay rebellion. il *$1.30 Appleton 13-3764

To satirize at one time the votes for women movement and the eugenic movement is Mr. Chambers' evident purpose. The women of his story have organized the New Race university. They live in caves, eat bon-bons and sally forth at times armed with butterfly nets in which they catch marriageable men who meet the eugenic ideal. Toward the end Mr. Chambers seems to forget his original plot and his book turns into a succession of short stories.

"A somewhat flimsy burlesque."
— Ath 1913,1:432 Ap 19 30w

"The result in cold print is a curiously incoherent succession of He and She narratives, with some incidental cleverness, much sugary dialogue, and in one case an interpolated ghost story—ghost distractingly pretty—with more sugary dialogue." R. B.

— + Boston Transcript p8 Mr 8 '13 670w

"We may say at once that, apart from the ground idea, he manages to avoid offending the most fastidious delicacy, and when he is in difficulties saves himself by a stutter. Moreover, he disappoints those who are watching his skilful balancing by dropping the whole subject of eugenics after he has prepared the preliminaries and turning to the woman question by itself. There is where the artistic side of the book breaks down. The book will pretty surely be a 'best seller,' for Mr. Chambers by this time is a past master in playing on the sensibilities and the intellectual limitations of the 'matinee girl.'"

"The historical technic is well-nigh faultless, and there is absolute honesty as to the nature of the sources of information. After some twelve years' study of the period, the reviewer found the volume abounding in facts that he did not know, and sown with shrewd and canny interpretations which are new and yet convincing. On the whole, this seems an historians' history, always to be admired and read with interest by the specialist, but unlikely to interest greatly the mere cultured reader, because in many parts too compact accompanied with too little explanation." CHAPMAN, JOHN JAY. William Lloyd Garrison. *$1.25 Moffat 13-10085

"To interpret an era by the study of a personality, and to make that personality singular, vivid and emphatic through the events of an era, is what Mr. Chapman does in this book on William Lloyd Garrison. . . . The whole history of anti-slavery has been recorded. Mr. Chapman's purpose is not to give a sequential account of its progress. He finds in Garrison an extraordinary man in whom the events of abolition were focused. . . . He becomes in Mr. Chapman's mind an idol, one of the world's great men; with Bunyan and Luther something of an enigma, but an irresistible, moving prophecy and in American history one of the very few of these perhaps, the greatest, whose services to humanity and country have exalted the man to saintly proportions of character."—Boston Transcript

The author, an English medical woman, says in the preface that her main endeavor in writing the book has been "to emphasize that in social reform the best results can be obtained by going to the sources, instead of dealing merely with the effects, of wrong and of suffering." Her treatment of her many-sided subject is scientific and thorough. Some of the matters to which she gives special consideration are: The legal position of wife and mother. The unmarried mother. The sweated mother in the home. The waste of mother energy. Women prisoners. Motherhood and the social evil. Motherhood and the woman movement.

Two appendices give a digest of the laws of various countries in regard to parentage, inheritance, the guardianship of illegitimate children, etc.

"'Cleverality' is the distinguishing feature of Mr. Chesterton's survey of 'The Victorian age in literature,' which is at once amazing and amusing. It is full of reckless exaggerations in which, after a brief display of modesty concerning his incompetence, the author suggests that anybody who does not see things as he does is a fool or an idiot. On the whole, his insight exceeds his silliness, and, if the reader duly recognizes the limits

CHILDERS, HUGH. Romantic trials of three centuries. il *$3 Lane 13-1389

"Avoiding on the one hand the kind of trial which bulks so largely in the hugh folios of 'State trials' and on the other the sordid affairs which are the chief pabulum of the 'Newgate calendar,' Mr. Childers yet found ample material to draw upon in the records of those cases wherein the principal actors were Elizabeth Canning, William Penn, Beau Fielding, the Duchess of Kingston, Dr. Dodd, Jean Peltier, Disraeli and the participants in the famous robbery of the Lyons mail. Several of these trials are of legal interest as establishing precedents and the like, but even those, and much more the others, have the interest of intrinsic curiosity or are justified in the retelling by their association with well-known characters or events."—Boston Transcript

"None of the numerous collections of notable trials published in recent years has made so readable a volume as this. Here and there the book is somewhat lacking in finish—a defect we may attribute to the death of Mr. Childers; but, with very few exceptions, the facts of the various trials are narrated with ease and dramatic effect."

CHILDS, MRS. ELEANOR STUART (PATERSON). Romance of Ali. il $1.25 (1½c) Harper 13-15855

Alexander Alexander, born in the orient, of western parents, reared in a sultan's harem, his very name orientalized to Ali Kisander by his adoring foster mother, is the hero of this romance of east and west. When nearing the end of boyhood Ali is taken from the harem that has been his home to live in European capitals under the guardianship of a famous German diplomat. The contrasting viewpoints of orient and occident are brought out as the story develops and a scene full of piquant interest is that which pictures the meeting of the two women who have most to do in shaping Ali's character, Fatuma the wise woman of the east, and Patricia, the fine modern girl of the west.

CHISHOLM, ARTHUR MURRAY. Precious waters. il $1.25 (1c) Doubleday 13-3072

A contest between a band of settlers in the arid country and a railroad which by a big irrigation project threatens to deprive them of the water on which their living depends furnishes the motif for this story. The leader of the settlers is Casey Donne, a forceful young man who has staked his all on his western ranch and who refuses to give up without a fight. Two love stories are worked out in the progress of the narrative—that of Casey and the girl from the east, and of Shella, his girl comrade and good friend, and the engineer on the irrigation contract.

"Though not remarkable, a clean, readable story that will interest some men."

+ A L A Bkl 9:341 Ap '13 *

"The author enlists the reader's sympathy in the manly hero, two attractive young women and various pleasing minor characters; he makes the fight interesting, though there may be more violence than is necessary, and bits of irrelevant melodrama are thrown in. The obstinate engineer remains repulsive in spite of his conversion. The book is well written."

CHOLMONDELEY, MARY. After all (Eng title, Notwithstanding). il $1.35 Appleton 13-23733

Miss Cholmondeley's "latest novel, is an excellent example of her method. She springs upon the reader an interesting situation, arrests attention, and arouses curiosity. Then gradually working backwards she reveals the true inwardness of the situation." (Sat R) A young girl, in hopeless despair after her first revelation of life's ugliness, is about to drown herself. She is rescued by a light, adventurous young Englishman who persuades her to run away with him. Fate takes him out of her life as suddenly as he entered it. The girl is left untouched and unchanged, but the shadow of the episode hangs over her, and for a time seems perilously near to blotting out the sun of happiness that dawns for her.

"The character-drawing is not without skill, yet we are grown somewhat tired of all the people in the book before we have reached with them the rather obvious ending. The narrative in itself is fluent and pleasing, and the dialogue, as usual with the author, is good."

But its very impressiveness leads to serious and searching consideration, and in such light it steadily pales and grows hollow, loses form and becomes flat, stale, and unprofitable. That is, the many admirable things are seen to be outweighed by defects, and the good qualities, though they are present, are by no means all they pretend to be."

CHRISTIE, MRS. JANE JOHNSTONE. Advance of woman, from the earliest times to the present. *$1.50 (2c) Lippincott 12-24302

In writing this book the author's desire has been "to set before men and women a continuous picture of society from early times to the present day. Most of the facts it contains are known to all reading people, but they are known as isolated facts and as such have no significance." The chapters are: Mankind's dumb progenitors; Early society and the matriarchate; The patriarchate and the historical period; Man as ruler; Man a social ruler; Woman as man has made her; Evil consequences of woman's degradation; What woman has done; A last word.

"'Advance of woman' is a much over-weighted book. The wheat and the chaff are hopelessly mingled; isolated statements and bitter comments may cause frequent irritation; yet, as a survey of human laws and customs concerning the relations of man and woman, her work will have its uses."

CHURCHILL, WINSTON. Inside of the cup. 1l *$1.50 (1c) Macmillan 13-11301

The Reverend John Hodder, an Episcopal clergyman, who has spent the years since his ordination in a secluded New England parish, is called to a fashionable church in a middle-western city. He knows singularly little of modern problems and in his theology is as orthodox as the rich men who control his church could desire. But St. John's, his church, is located on Dalton street, a thoroughfare once fashionable that has now become the home of poverty and want and vice. The facts of modern life are thrust upon Hodder; an awakening follows, and a struggle, and in the end he works out a solution which brings with it a stronger renewal of faith.

As a contribution to the discussion of vital modern problems 'The inside of the cup' is important, although there is ample room for forcible and effective answers to many of Mr. Churchill's contentions. But it deals with that problem rather too obviously. And the writer is so intensely absorbed in his theory that he subordinates everything else to it. The result is less a novel than a tract. The Rev. John Hodder strikes us as the most unreal person Mr. Churchill has introduced into his pages. And this is because he is less interested in him than in what he stands for. Mr. Churchill has strong convictions as to the function of religion in modern life. And we believe that his convictions are in the main sound. It is right that he should hold them and wish to convey them. But we believe he has chosen the wrong means of conveyance."

— + Nation 96:598 Je 12 '13 1050w

"His hero is more satisfactory as a debater than as a man. He is merely a stalking horse for the ideas Mr. Churchill wishes to propound and must be converted to social service; the conversion is much too clumsy. The episodes in the story are managed much better. These also are mainly arguments, but there is some life to the women the clergyman argues with. The rich man who thinks he owns the church is true to life; it is a pity he should turn into a symbol for ill earned wealth and power. So it runs throughout the book, an interesting person attracts the reader's attention and as soon as he has done that is made the vehicle for a long argument."

The purpose of the author is to clear the reputation of "the Connecticut patriot who, after performing great services to the revolutionary cause was unjustly accused both of embezzlement and treachery and whose treason is written of to this day by authors who should know better. The most glowing estimate of Deane—whose name, however, must be almost unknown to the majority of readers—is that he would have ranked with Robert Morris and John Jay had he not been basely conspired against."—Springfield Republican

CLARKE, CHARLES J. L. Boys' book of modern marvels. il $1.75 Stokes A13-371

Mr. Clarke believes that "the mechanical triumphs of the modern world are perhaps among its greatest achievements." His volume discusses "broadly those achievements which help to make the efficiency of a city such as London. The wonders of the printing press vie with the triumphs of engineering, concrete building, bridge erecting and kindred topics; in addition to which consideration is paid to fire, water, police, hospital and sanitary systems in London. With little variations, the same considerations can be paid to all large cities in America. There are photographic illustrations." (Ind)

CLARKE, HELEN ARCHIBALD. Browning and his century. il $1.50 Doubleday 12-28692

This "study of Browning is an attempt to appraise his work in terms of the philosophical and religious, political and social, artistic and literary ideals of his time." (N Y Sun) "The author sketches the scientific, philosophical, ethical and social movements of that 'battle between mind and spirit' which raged during the mid-nineteenth century, and traces their influence upon the writings of the giants of literature of the age. She shows how the poems of Browning mark these movements more clearly than those of any of his confrères, voicing with the splendid force and optimism of genius the problems of his day." A well written story whose interest for the general reader will not be lessened by its strong religious bias. It is an English story in which two young lovers are separated thru religious differences. Felix Scaife, brought under the influence of Catholicism thru meeting with a Franciscan friar and contact with monastic life, unites with the church tho the act loses him the girl he loves. The two then live thru those weeks of separation which in the words of Ben Jonson's "Sad shepherd" be-

CLEMEN, CARL CHRISTIAN. Primitive
6 Christianity and its non-Jewish sources;
tr. by Robert G. Nisbet. 11 *$3.50 Scribner
(Eng ed A13-488)

"Professor Clemén first gives a history of religious-historical interpretation; and in this section he concisely describes the different works of first rate importance in this field. . . . Then he describes the method of such investigation, and the presuppositions necessary for a valid interpretation. The first part is an examination of Christian thought in some of its more general aspects, and the leading ideas of Christianity. Under the latter head he discusses the ideas inherited from Judaism, the new ideas of Christianity, and the institutions of primitive Christianity. Part two discusses the teachings of Jesus, Pauline theology, and the ideas of the Johannine writings. . . . He sums up his conclusions in the closing chapter, the most important of which is that an indirect or direct influence of non-Jewish religious and philosophical systems on the teaching of Jesus and the ideas of the Synoptists is discernible merely in certain expressions, metaphors, and comparisons; the subject matter as a whole, is very little affected. . . . There is a general index, one of Old Testament texts, New Testament texts, of the Apocrypha, of Apocalyptic literature, of Greek words, and, finally, one of modern authors. Twelve important illustrations on two plates are added at the close of the volume."—Boston Transcript

A group of Kentucky stories in which the author, a native Kentuckian, tries to picture truly the real southern life as opposed to the romantic ideal of it furnished in fiction. The hero in most of the tales is a loveable level-headed old judge. "In Judge Priest he has created a figure compact of all that the memories and associations of people south of Mason and Dixon's line hold familiar in the generation to which the Judge belongs. . . . COLLIE, SIR JOHN. Malingering and feigned sickness, by J. Collie, assisted by Arthur H. Spicer. il *$3 Longmans
(Eng ed A13-1386)

A work prepared to meet a special need. "It seems there has been a great deal of feigned disability among the British working folk since the passage of the Workmen's compensation act of 1906. A great many fraudulent claims for compensation have been presented to manufacturers and others by their employees and most of them have been allowed. The purpose of Sir John Collie's work is primarily to indicate to members of his profession how they may detect malingering, and so help put an end to this form of robbery." (N Y Times)

COLLIER, PRICE. Germany and the Germans from an American point of view. $1.50 (1c) Scribner 13-12309

"'Germany and the Germans' is a moderately long essayical treatment of the characteristics and problems of Germany today, especially in so far as these characteristics are peculiarly beyond the assimilation of other nations. . . . After devoting some hundred pages to a discussion of history from the no-Germany of the middle ages through Bismarck to the present united empire, he takes up contemporaneous threads, showing each one as distinctly as their interweaving will permit." "Although the book is not exhaustive or repetitious, and pretends in no way to be an authoritative revelation of 'inside' facts, it is singularly complete and satisfying, because Mr. Collier has neither spread nor stinted his point of view. He never tries to be more than an enlightened American theorizing on Germany. Perhaps his largeness and good sense are the secret of the richness of the book, which is so delightful in these days of slight essays. Like all authors with a great deal of material, he may digress in blissful moments of well-stocked leisure, but he always lets us know when he is on the track again. It can be said, too, with little hesitation that he never wears or perplexes. 'Germany and the Germans' is essentially a stimulating book, not over-scholarly, much less pseudo-scholarly, but straight-

COLLINS, CHARLES WALLACE. Fourteenth amendment and the states: a study of the operation of the restraint clauses of section one of the Fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. il $2 Little 12-26723

The author tells the "story of a charter of liberty perverted into a refuge for privilege. The Fourteenth amendment, adopted amid the excitement and partizanship of the reconstruction period, soon became for the most part, a dead letter, except section 1, which the corporations found they could use. . . . This section forbids the states to 'deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law' or to deny to any person 'the equal protection of the laws.' 'Person' has been stretched by the courts to include 'corporation.' The original purpose is plain, namely, to protect the freedmen, in their civil, political and social rights, against oppression or discrimination. But Mr. Collins shows that the benefit accruing to the negro from the Fourteenth amendment is practically negligible. . . . In a chapter entitled 'Proposed remedies,' Mr. Collins considers repeal of the Fourteenth amendment and possible action by Congress designed to have the effect of repeal in whole or in part. He recommends a middle course of legislation which would greatly reduce federal interference with state action."—Ind

Descriptive note in December, 1912.

"They who cannot understand how a book can possibly be interesting and at the same time scholarly will suspect the scholarship of this book until they examine it critically. It is easy to be carried away by the story, and if one were to venture a criticism, it would be that the author has not adequately safeguarded the reader against this temptation. It is better to consider the two volumes as history rather than with the qualifying adjective 'economic.' Even thus they are not satisfying. There are omissions in the bibliography [which] indicate the superficial manner in which the data have been collected. COMFORT, WILL LEVINGTON. Down among 12 men. *$1.25 (1½c) Doran 13-23881

This story, which opens during the Russo-Japanese war, is told with that sketchy, somewhat breathless, style that is characteristic of Mr. Comfort's work. John Morning is a war correspondent, working "on space," who makes a sensational journey thru China and across the Pacific to bring home the biggest war story of the year—a description of the battle of Liaoyang. He tastes, as so many others have tasted, the bitterness of triumph and learns that it is down among men, in work for human brotherhood, that he can find the only success worth achieving. They who would do a great work must go alone, is the book's teaching, and Betty Berry, the woman of the story, believing this, finds that renunciation and the denial of love is the best service she can give her lover.

"The man-talk in 'Down among men' is good until it becomes corybantic with the great compassion. The woman-talk, on the other hand, is apart from any common to our experience. Fallows is more attractive as a man than a missionary. Morning could become a man well loved. That they are loved for their Messiah-likeness Mr. Comfort does not make us believe. We wish Mr. Comfort would stick to men and preach us no missionaries." W. A. M.

Although there are some things which cannot be learned out of a book, and although talking would seem to be one of them, here is a suggestive little volume that will prove well worth reading by anyone who would be more proficient in an art which all must practice. The author draws certain clear distinctions—between discussion and controversy; gossip and slander; and between talking with and talking at a person. Her chapter headings are, What conversation is and what it is not; Discussion versus controversy; Gossip; What should the guests talk about at dinner; Talk of host and hostess at dinner; Interruption in conversation; Power of fitness, tact and nicety in business words.

CONNOR, RALPH, pseud. (CHARLES WILLIAM GORDON). Corporal Cameron of the North West mounted police. *$1.25 Doran 12-25203

That splendid type of the upright out-of-door man about which Ralph Connor builds all his stories appears again in his new book. "His present hero is a braw laddie from the Highlands, who, on the international football team, at Edinburgh, 'in the face of all Scotland and in the hour of her need, failed because he wasn't fit.' So, from the start, the first division of his fight is cut out for him, against the devils within himself; and after he goes to Canada he meets with plenty more occasion for warfare, both within and without. The scene of the first third of the book is laid in Scotland, partly in Edinburgh and partly in a lovely glen in the Highlands, and the rest of it is in Canada." (N Y Times)

CONRAD, JOSEPH. 'Twixt land and sea. *$1.25 Doran 12-27196

"Although the three stories are of the sea and its people, although their scenes are never far from shore and are for the most part the decks and cabins of ships, there is in them nothing of the storm and stress of the ocean. Their passions and conditions are of the spirit and the soul of man. . . . In each of these tales Mr. Conrad is himself ostensibly the narrator as a master-mariner, the calling he followed until he gave up the sea for literature. They are all told in a mood of reminiscence, and they reveal the reflective nature of a man who is prone to ponder upon the motives of human action." On becoming an heiress, she is thrown into the companionship of two other idealists who have taken St. Francis as their model. The efforts made by the two boys and the girl to carry their theories into practice presage with a fine pathos the trials of their maturity. (Eng ed 13-6925)

"This book has an interesting origin. Miss Emily Warren, when a very young girl, asked Ruskin for art advice, and by him was helped and encouraged. After Ruskin's death, from time to time for years she visited the places Ruskin loved, and from them made the twenty-eight colored drawings here beautifully reproduced, together with many sketches in black and white. The English lakes, Scotland, Italy, France, and Switzerland the artist found subjects of charm; and Mr. Cook has found it easy to write pleasantly and with suggestion of art and social inspiration of Ruskin's association with these varied and lovely 'homes and haunts.'"—Outlook

"Possibly the drawing should claim the first place in consideration, but, when all is said for them that can be said, they remain secondary. No doubt Sir E. T. Cook was well advised in his choice, but whether the reproduction is at fault or not, the execution of the pictures here given does not rise above that of the conscientious amateur. The text has need less to say, the value of supreme authority. Repetition has been avoided, and no attempt has been made to exhaust the subject."

He does not set out to write a history, but offers just that pleasant talk about the forest which was wanted. Mr. Cooke not only describes the forest and its woodland, and tells us much about the felling of trees, bark-stripping, and other details of forestry, but also he takes us—usually on foot—for a great many excursions from the best centres, and covers every part of the 11,000 acres (roughly) which are under timber. He further shows us every church and house of interest in a district much larger than the 'Forest.'"—Ath

A speech on the day of his impeachment wins the people to his side, and the later resumption of friendly relations with the German nation justifies his course.

There was really nothing left for Mr. Cornish to say in the way of biography, and he has, possibly for that reason, devoted most of his chapters to a running comment on the novels. Here his criticism of the characters is shrewd and has the pleasant flavor of talk about people with whom one is intimately acquainted, but one cannot take much interest in the analysis of the plots."

The author advocates the use of common sense in the study of art and says that in so doing he is only "urging the reader to keep his head and his sense of humor, to be wary of the esoteric qualities commended to him by the pundit of whatever artistic or critical persuasion, to look at a work of art in a natural human way, with an open mind." The papers following the title essay are: Ingres: a pilgrimage to Montauban; The magic of mere paint; Contemporary European painting; A note on French military painting; The post-impressionist illusion; A memorable exhibition; Whistler; Sargent; Spanish art in Spain and elsewhere; Secular types in Italian mural decoration; Rodin; Four leaders in American architecture; J. CORWIN, EDWARD SAMUEL. National supremacy. $1.50 (2c) Holt 13-18628

Certain problems arising from the dual nature of government in the United States furnish the field for the study set forth in this volume. "To investigate the relation of the national treaty-power to state power" is the author's stated aim. His treatment is historical and in his eleven chapters he considers the subject under these heads: The scope of the treaty-power; The supremacy of national power; The original view of the treaty-power; State sovereignty and the police power; Treaty-power versus police power; Adjudication since the civil war; Recent practice and opinion; The necessary and proper powers of the United States; The enforcement of treaties, with a final chapter presenting his conclusions.

COSENZA, MARIO EMILIO. Francesco Petrarca and the revolution of Cola di Rienzo. $1.50 (2½c) Univ. of Chicago press. 13-5425

A study of the Italian poet as a statesman and patriot. "In substance it is a translation of Petrarca's letters to Rienzo and of all the portions of his other letters that refer in any way to the Roman tribune and his history. Each, however, is accompanied by a scholarly historical commentary which, combined with the letters, forms a continuous account of Rienzo, and the revolution. Dr. Cosenza demonstrates that Petrarca believed in Rienzo to the end, and lays stress on the poet's Italian patriotism. The letters are supplied with full explanatory notes and references to authorities." (N Y Sun)

"The notes are timely and informing, and the author often supplements and corrects those in Fracassetti's edition and translation of Petrarch's letters. On the other hand, in the historical sketch, which serves as a framework to the translation and notes, Dr. Cosenza shows that he is unequal to his task." G: L. Hamilton.

The author writes from a long experience in the children's court of New York city, and his book is a revelation of the processes by which criminals are made. It is further an arraignment of the chief offender in that trilogy of offenders wherever a child delinquent is concerned—the child, the parent and the community. Of these the last is the most culpable for it is responsible for the environment. The book is largely given up to an exposition of existing conditions. The last two chapters consider remedial measures, chief among them the Big brother and sister movement.

A story with scenes laid in the Great Smoky mountains which, because the characters are merely a group of well-bred people who might belong anywhere, lacks the distinction of the earlier books by the author whose chief charm has always depended on her reproduction of the out-of-the-world atmosphere of southern moun-

CRAIG, AUSTIN. Lineage, life and labors of José Rizal, Philippine patriot; introd. by James Alexander Robertson. il $2.50 (4c) Philippine educ. co., Manila 13-21268

José Rizal, the subject of this biography, was the young Filipino patriot who was put to death by the Spanish authorities two years before the American occupation of the islands. He was also a novelist and made his novels (two of which are reviewed in the "Digest" for the present year) the vehicles for spreading his ideas of social reform. Professor Craig calls his book "a study of the growth of free ideas in the trans-Pacific American territory."

"As a biography this book has its defects, but it commemorates a man who deserved his country's love and honor."

+ — Outlook 104: 64 Ag 23 '13 100w

"Prof. Craig's biography, though written with great care for detail, is not more than mediocre. As a sympathetic story of the Filipino patriot it is dedicated to the youth of the Philippines and carries through it a gentle undercurrent of advice and exhortation. It is by no means a deep analysis of character, and at times the transition of place or theme is vague, but on the whole the straightforward recitation of facts leaves the reader with a fairly good idea of the man, though without in any large sense explaining him."

"Forty designs for stage scenes, with critical notes by the inventor" make up the contents of this volume. He is trying to bring back into the theatre some of the sense of greatness and breadth, some of the profounder elements in human nature, which the stage seems to have lost since it 'came indoors.'" (N Y Times)

"If we were giving some one this book, we should say that it was not to be read as a work of art; or even to find out what the writer hopes the future art will be (for that he does not know himself, though he can be more detailed than he is here); but read to get in touch with an inspiring spirit, comprehensive in knowledge, though unscientific in language."

"The forty highly original and imaginative designs in this beautifully printed volume, and the critical and explanatory notes attached to them, are proof positive of the author's lofty aspirations and artistic instinct; but they are often so fantastic in their symbolism as to raise grave doubts of their practical applicability—or even desirability—in the theatre. Mr. Craig has no general grasp of the subject to which he has devoted so much time and labor. The early chapters are devoted to: Players and playhouses of the eighteenth century; Early ups and downs of the theatre in the south; Rise of the theatre as an American institution; The curious adventures of certain early English stars. CROCKETT, SAMUEL RUTHERFORD. Patsy. *$1.25 (1½c) Macmillan 13-121

The Scotland of a century ago is the scene of this story in which most of the action takes place on the Galloway coast, where smugglers and press gangs and king's soldiers meet in many an exciting skirmish. Patsy, the wilful young heroine, who has Pictish blood in her veins and is proud of it, is more like a modern girl of today than like a modest eighteenth century maiden; for, refusing to be controlled or guided by father, uncle or anyone else, Patsy follows her own course and marries her "ain love," even tho he be an outlaw at the time with a price on his head.

"Improbable and over-long, but well written and interesting."

+ — A L A Bkl 9:293 Mr '13 ✚

"Mr. Crockett's description of the picturesque land and its people is the best part of the story. His characters and the land in which they dwell are, however, interwoven into and contrasted with the plot and a series of events that are extraordinarily commonplace, and that have served his predecessors well through many an era of the writing of romantic fiction. Mr. Crockett leaves altogether too much to his reader's imagination. His sense of humor, moreover, is not of the keenest, and many of the happenings in his story, notably the honeymoon on the island, cannot be taken very seriously." E. F. E.

That filial ingratitude that is "sharper than a serpent's tooth" gives this story its plot and its title. Letty Glyn, married at seventeen to a man many years her senior, leads a life of marital unhappiness, and as the crowning tragedy of that life, experiences the bitterness of seeing the daughter to whom she has devoted herself, turn from her.

Every fact is supported by references to original sources, and matters of more elaborate controversy are dealt with in appendices that are models of clearness and impartiality. "It possesses a mellowness and a sanity of judgment that can never be acquired by hasty or superficial work. Here and there a more careful revision might have been given to the proofs, and more dates of years—the month is often given without it—would have added to the clearness of the narrative. These, however, are small blemishes easily remedied in any future edition of a work which for the scholar possesses the merit of very accurate documentation, and for the general reader the literary charm that comes from an intimate and sympathetic understanding of a character of singular beauty." Indeed, we may safely say that the present work deserves to be taken as the standard English biography of the Saint. It is critical as well as popular, and adds newly discovered data to the investigations of Sabatier; Joergensen, Carmichael, Father Paschal Robinson, and many other scholars engaged in this field of inquiry. DALY, THOMAS AUGUSTINE. Madrigals. II
*$1 McKay 12-25599

Poems of three types make up the contents of T. A. Daly's new volume. There are, first, his inimitable Italian songs, "Pasquale passes," "Da spreeng charmer," "The blossomy barrow," and others merry and tender. There are, too, his Irish verses, no less captivating, "The man's the man," and "Girls will change," and added to these there are a few poems in English, free from dialect, in which the poet speaks more expressly for himself. Such are "October song in Romany," "What the flag sings," and "Labor's sabbath."

"The note of human interest and sympathy which makes a sure appeal to the reader is never absent."

"Mr. Daly has all of James Whitcomb Riley's human feeling, but he shows a broader if not intenser sympathy, finding in many contrasted types of temperament and character those humorous and tragic experiences of the heart and soul that lay bare the thoughts and feelings of lowly human nature. His appeal is quick because instinctive, and leaves an impression because the spirit in which the verse shapes itself is naively tender and wholesome." W. S. B.

"Students of French history will doubtless remember the name of the Comte Roger de Damas, but probably only a few will be able to recall the details of his career. Born in times that made soldiering almost a necessity, he was lucky in having a decided bent for that profession. By inclination he was a soldier of fortune, and in 1787, at the age of 22—against the wishes of his family, and without the permission of his superior officers—he set off to offer his sword to Russia, then engaged with her ally Austria in a war against the Turks. . . . The story of his subsequent career may be read in these memoirs. . . . A point which will be of particular interest to English readers is his criticism of Nelson during that none too happy period of the latter's sojourn at Naples under the spell of Lady Hamilton."—Ath

"While the Journal . . . is of especial interest in relation to an incident in the early settlement of Maryland, the gage of its value may be applied as well in other directions. DAVIDSON, L. MARION. Gates of the Dolomites. il *$1.50 Lane W13-7

A book written as a guide to the Dolomite country. The author is "an enthusiast about that region of the Tyrolean Alps, and her account of the several approaches, or 'gates' to it; of the scenery, and of the experiences to be had as one journeys through any part, makes plain her conviction that no other mountain adventuring can be quite so exhilarating and so entirely delightful as that among these weirdly piled up rocks." (N Y Times) A chapter on the flora of the Dolomites by F. M. Spencer is added to the volume, and there is an introduction by Sir Melvil Beachcroft.

"As Miss Davidson has often visited the Dolomites, she might have produced a better book. The repetition of uninteresting information and the want of careful arrangement are serious drawbacks. The spelling has been too much for the index-maker, who has made mistakes of his own, and not covered the ground as the purpose of the book demands. The 'Hotel guide' appears to favour the few hotel-keepers who have advertised in the book. The volume is made up of the memoirs of the man who was musical critic of the London Times for forty years from 1846 on. "During that period occurred the long warfare between the classicists and those who were opening up new paths. . . . Davison fought for the classicists, yet the articles which he wrote about the first Bayreuth festival of 1876 show that he then recognized the genius of Wagner, even though he did not approve of his theories or his practice. . . . The volume contains numerous portraits of musicians; also letters, previously unpublished and some highly characteristic, by Mendelssohn . . . Berlioz, Gounod, Jullien, Macfarren, and Sterndale Bennett." (Ath)

"The book is, in the absence of better lives of the two heroes, a very useful book, if not taken too seriously. Aside from the biographies, there is a fairly good picture of colonial and revolutionary society. In the knowledge of the small things of life, the author shows good historical background, but in the matter of the essentials of the history he is not so well informed." C. H. Van Tyne.

DAWLEY, THOMAS ROBINSON, JR. Child that tolleth not. il *$2 Gracia pub. 12-27954

A former investigator of the Department of commerce and labor "has discussed the employment of children in the cotton mills of the South and has compared their lot as they tend their spindles with the life they led on the mountain farms from which most of them came. He has gone into actual cases, and has spoken directly of factories and farms that he has visited, and he maintains that under certain conditions and in connection with a certain economic state of society employment for children in the mills is not only harmless but an actual blessing." (N Y Times)

"This book is not entitled to scientific recognition within the field of labor problems. The greatest value of this volume lies outside the field of labor. It is interesting and readable because of its narrative and descriptive style, and its close touch with human life. It is also a valuable contribution of detailed information upon the social life of the mountaineers." R. W. Foley.

+ — Am J Soc 19:94 J1 '13 350w

"Mr. Dawley's book is interesting, but does not command confidence in many respects. When due allowance has been made for the author's eccentricities and misinterpretations, however, two significant facts will be brought home to the reader with telling effect: the sections of the South described are in dire need of industrial and agricultural education, and the entire absence of physical employment does not leave a child in the best situation to absorb elementary instruction. The emphasis on these facts is unmistakable, and it is worth having."

+ — Ind 74:701 Mr 27 '13 500w

"Perhaps, however, the intolerance, of which it is impossible to acquit Mr. Dawley altogether, stands out more clearly than it should by reason of the method he has employed. He has indicated his views by merely reciting what he saw and heard and he has not reduced his opinions to formal statement. If he had done so he might have put in reservations and qualifications which would have altered materially the general impression made by his book. But he has undoubtedly gained force by this method of expression, and his conclusions are certainly worthy of close examination, and if they cannot be refuted, of frank acceptance by those interested in sociology."

+ — N Y Times 18:36 Ja 26 '13 1300w

"This is a book meriting serious attention, for the truth in regard to the matters involved, both directly and indirectly, is of peculiar importance. His account of the conditions under which he saw children working in the mills sounds rather too idyllic, and the reader may reasonably question whether the author, though entirely honest, is not one of those in whom a 'contrary' spirit leads to a not altogether well proportioned view in combating a popular idea."

+ — Springfield Republican p5 Ap 10 '13 800w

"To the present writer it is evident that the fundamental 'raison d'être' of Mr. Dawley's book is that he failed in a measure to understand the kind of work required of him by the Bureau of labor, that he set about his task not only with a wrong method, but in a wrong spirit, and that, beginning thus his task, he could hardly fail to have crowned it as he has done with a biased and unjustly personal attack. I believe that Mr. Dawley convicts himself of these things out of his own mouth. In all fairness to Mr. Dawley, it must be said that his book is an interesting contribution to the literature of the social problems of the South. It is thoroughly readable, and it bristles with 'human interest' stories concerning the natives and their ways. One cannot, nevertheless, help having the feeling that scientific accuracy has been sacrificed for the sake of a good yarn." W: L. Stoddard.

The author's purpose is "to appeal to the intelligence of the ordinary man and woman, rather than to the scientific student, and to interest them in the problems of eugenics. . . . After explaining the wonderful share men and women have in the creation of life, he begs civilization not to dismiss with indifference or sneers the teachings and warnings of scientific eugenics. It is an honest plea he makes in behalf of all children, who cannot choose their parents, but have an inherent right to proper nurture and good birth." Sarah Morgan, was living in Baton Rouge at the time of the town's occupation by Federal troops in May, 1862. Her home was sacked, and the women of her household lived for nearly a year in the midst of danger and constant flights for safety. DAY, REV. LAL BEHARI. Folk-tales of Bengal. il *$5.25 Macmillan

"This volume includes a large number of the unwritten stories which old women in India tell to little children in the evening. The author hunted out an ancient Bengali Christian woman who was a good story-teller and had heard her grandmother tell some of these Indian fairy tales, as they might be called."—Outlook

"Not only delightful, imaginative fairy-tales in themselves, but have also long been accepted as an important contribution to the literature of folk-lore. No subject could have been better suited to the artist's gifts. To a line evidently reminiscent of Japanese art he adds a luxuriant imagination and a delight in exquisite detail. Yet his drapery is not altogether successful, and he fails to suggest the lissom figures and typical poses of the natives. But he reproduces admirably the Indian feeling, for rich ornamentation in miniature."

Old orders change, however, and the most peaceful of careers may be affected thereby; Cleveland is elected and a new postmaster appointed for Furham, Vermont. It is then that William Sprague, the new executive devises a scheme whereby Amanda can avert the blow to her mother's pride. The partnership is enlarged to include three.

DE LA PASTURE, ELIZABETH (BONHAM)
" (MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE) (LADY HUGH CLIFFORD). Honourable Mrs. Garry. (Eng title, Erica) $1.35 Dutton 12-24918

The story follows "Master Christopher" and carries on the career of Erica Clow the young woman whom, at the close of the first book, we saw betrothed to Christopher Thorverton. Learning that Erica professes to care more for a rival than for himself Christopher breaks the engagement and Erica promptly marries Tom Garry. "The substance of the present story lies in Garry's gradual discovery that his wife is anything but the noble character he has imagined her. She, for her part, makes an attempt to live up to his theory of her; but she is incapable of exertion in the interest of others, and when accident cuts off his life he has already lost interest in it. . . . A third story dealing with Erica is promised." (Nation)

A L A Bkl 9:257 F '13

"The tediousness of the woman's childish vulgarity and superficiality is somewhat mitigated by the introduction of a husband of the Ouida guardsman type, and the artistic restraint of the page or two devoted to his death is in pleasing contrast to much else in the book. As a psychological study of a thoughtless woman it has merit."

*$1.35 (1c) Putnam 12-26897

The three sons of an American family living in England are the characters about whom the story turns. Nap. Erroll, who is only half-brother to the other two, and in whose veins there is Indian blood, is the family scapegrace; and it is the regenerating influence of his older brother Lucas and of Anne Carfax whom he loves, that tames and civilizes him. A pathetic note in the story is the love of Lucas for Anne.

"The feeling that the end is obviously in sight throughout detracts somewhat from the reader's interest, but the fact that that interest is in large measure maintained throughout is evidence of the author's artistry."

DEMETRIOS, GEORGE. When I was a boy in Greece. il *60c (2½c) Lothrop 13-7644

This story is told by a Greek lad who has lived for something over a year in Boston. It is an account from memory of his early years in a Macedonian village, with pictures of his home life, and school days, and translations of some of the legends, and stories told by the winter fireside in his home. He makes an earnest plea for the study of the modern Greek language and regrets the Anglicized pronunciation that is taught in English and American schools. His whole narrative is instinct with patriotic feeling and, altho he left his native land before its freedom from the rule of Turkey was gained, he quotes as a postscript an enthusiastic letter from his sister, describing the Greek victory.

DENT, EDWARD J. Mozart's operas: a critical study. ll $4 (3c) McBride, Nast & co.

"This book has been written with a double purpose: first to present Mozart's principal operas as still living works to modern audiences; and, secondly, to draw from them illustrations of certain points of view from which music in general and opera in particular may be considered." (Preface) "Mr. Dent traces the growth of Mozart's genius, his strength, and his mastery of technique from his first endeavours to the fruit of his maturity. The most valuable study in the book is that of 'Don Giovanni,' where he shows how the unevenness of the style must be attributed to the defects in Da Ponte's libretto." (Sat R)

DESSOIR, MAX. Outlines of the history of psychology; authorized tr. by Donald Fisher. *$1.60 (3c) Macmillan 12-26265

The author begins his work with an introduction in which he considers the three sources of interest in mental life, and the earlier attempts at knowledge of human nature. The ancient conception of the life of the soul and the doctrine of the soul in the middle ages and the renaissance are the subjects of chapters 1 and 2. "The body of the book traces the history of psychology from the theological and the biological standpoints from the time of the early Greek philosophers to modern times. The history is confined entirely to western thought." (Boston Transcript)

"Prof. Dessoir's book is strong where Mr. Brett's is weak, namely, in tracing the various streams of tradition and speculation which have influenced the course of development of psychological theory. It is much to be regretted also that Prof. Dessoir should have brought his book to a stop just at the time of the inception of the very active modern development of psychology, for an historical guide to this period is already urgently needed. Apart from these defects, the book deserves the highest praise, and the translation will be welcome to many English readers."

DIBBLEE, GEORGE BINNEY. The newspaper.
5 (Home university library of modern knowledge) il *50c (1c) Holt 13-7624

In writing of the newspaper the author has aimed to "write chiefly of what most people seldom or never see and but little of all those aspects of any newspaper which every reader is accustomed to judge for himself." The newspaper has three functions: first, it is a collector and distributor of news; second, it is a vehicle of opinion; third, it serves as an introducer of business from one trader to another. It is with the mechanism underneath these functions that the author is chiefly concerned.

A L A Bkl 9:424 Je '13

"Excellent use has been made in this volume, for the most part, of the limited space at the author's disposal. On the labour section of the press Mr. Dibblee is extraordinarily out of date. He speaks of the Daily citizen as shortly to appear from Manchester, but this is an extreme instance, though in other matters his lack of up-to-date knowledge prevents us from recommending him as a trustworthy guide. DICKIE, REV. JAMES F. Germany; painted by
E. T. and E. H. Compton. *20s Black (A and C.), London A13-2210

In the few pages of text in this volume the author can give but "a very cursory survey of the subject. He takes the reader, however, for a rapid tour of the Fatherland from east to west, from north to south, but it is the series of seventy-five reproductions all in colour which form the feature of the book." — Int Studio

"If we do not like the letterpress, we can give high praise to the seventy-five excellent pictures by the Messrs. Compton. The artists have illustrated all the well-known cities, and many places little visited by the English, and the book will give valuable hints to tourists who want to see new ground."

— Ath 1912,2:513 N 2 220w

"The illustrations give an excellent idea of the scenery and town architecture in different parts of Germany; and besides being, as far as one can judge from personal knowledge of a good many of the places depicted, topographically accurate, the artists have given proof of a very pleasant gift of colour and of composition."

+ N Y Times 17:748 D 1 '12 60w

"There are only two hundred short pages of letterpress, and these are, on the whole, well written. They do not very closely follow the pictures but are rather a sketchy guide-book to as much of the country as space allows. In so vast a subject there must be omissions. Mr. Dickie has a weakness for apostrophizing the towns and for chronicling details of crowned heads, but he makes a very creditable effort to put forward the immense variety of attractive and historical scenery."

DICKINSON, CHARLES HENRY. Christian
11 reconstruction of modern life. *$1.50 (2½c)
Macmillan 13-19692

"The object of this book is the spiritualizing of the social passion. The undertaking has grown from the conviction that this mightiest force of our time can attain its reconstructive purpose only as it is conscious of its own implicit spiritual quality." (Preface) The author finds that modern divergences from the Christian religion are due to a fundamental difference between our civilization and Christianity. Our civilization is essentially Hellenic, and the phrase Christian civilization is a juxtaposition of two unfused terms. This matter of our two inheritances is discussed in part 1, The radical division in modern life. The subject of discussion in part 2 is Jesus and modern life.

"In his brief preface the author states that the motive for writing this book is that, in his judgment, previous biographies have not been altogether fair and impartial. American biographers have claimed too much for Fulton, while English writers too often have dismissed him contemptuously. Mr. Dickinson has endeavored, therefore, by careful research to get at the important facts and to present them without bias. In this effort he has brought to light a great deal of new documentary material." (Engin Rec) "Appendices contain a wealth of data supplementary to the narrative." (N Y Sun)

In substance these essays were first delivered extemporaneously to a group of business men.

They were afterwards written out in the form in which they now appear. "After discussing in an introductory chapter the new bases of thought, the larger freedom, the scientific spirit, the changed motives, which characterize the modern world, the author proceeds to set forth with remarkable force and clearness the new conceptions of the Bible, the person of Christ, God and salvation, and immortality, together with the grounds upon which these conceptions rest. The discussions are conciliatory and constructive in character. They make it apparent that the new conceptions of religious truth are as well founded for our time as were the old for our fathers." DINSMORE, JOHN WIRT. Training of children. $1 (1c) Am. bk. 12-18224

The book is designed for the use of young teachers but its simple, untechnical treatment of its subject recommends it too to the consideration of young parents who have never come into touch with principles of pedagogy and child study. The author's aim has been "not only to supply practical knowledge in plain and simple language but to indicate continually the way to apply it." Part 1 deals with the training of the child prior to school age; Part 2 with School life.

DITCHFIELD, REV. PETER HAMPSON. Cottages and the village life of rural England. $6 Dutton 13-14271

The author, who is an English country clergyman has several earlier books on village life to his credit. "His knowledge of the romantic past is based on a sure foundation, so that with him sentiment has its roots in something more than the superficial gleanings of a summer vacation. Lest it might be imagined that Mr. Ditchfield is overtiling his particular acre, it should be remembered that change is rapidly passing over the village life of England." (Boston Transcript)

"Mr. Ditchfield says plainly in the preface that 'the genesis of the present work is the delightful series of sketches in colour which Mr. Quinton has depicted,' and we agree with him in general admiration of the artist's pretty pictures. He has not, however, been at all catholic in his delineation of England's village homes. Mr. Ditchfield, in his preface, airs strong political and social convictions which are out of place. His text is fluent, but commonplace."

DITCHFIELD, REV. PETER HAMPSON. Old English country squire. il *$3.50 Doran

"Mr. Ditchfield, who erstwhile gave us his study of the old-time parson, has now penned a record of the ways and influence of the 'fine old English gentleman.' He duly traces the descent of the squires from the knights, and makes pretty play with the material provided by Chaucer and the Paston letters. . . . From the days of the knights and squires, he passes to the era of the 'New men' who succeeded to the wealth of the monasteries, and to the squires of east and west, of Suffolk or Devon, who sailed with Raleigh, Grenville, or Hawkins in quest of wealth and adventure, as their sons sail now to Africa, Mexico, or the Argentine. The Verney memoirs and the instances of Sir John Hastings and Lord Falkland help to reveal the squire of the seventeenth century." (Ath) "The volume is most appropriately illustrated by some two dozen page plates, part of them in color, from old drawings and engravings." (N Y Times)

"Instruction is purveyed with due consideration for the reader's digestion, and none will read his pages without pleasure and amusement. There must needs be gaps in a book of this sort. We notice them chiefly in Mr. Ditchfield's treatment of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries."

DIXON, THOMAS. Southerner. il *$1.35 (1c)
Appleton 13-12599

The Southerner of Mr. Dixon's novel is Abraham Lincoln, the Kentucky born president. He is the central figure in the story, and the political antagonism of the time toward him is made the moving force of the story. With the movements of the army of northern Virginia it is also concerned, and the romantic interest is furnished by the presence in Washington of a young protégée of the president, Betty Winter, who is loved by two brothers, one true to the Union, one loyal to the South.

+ — A L A Bkl 10:69 O '13

"No man can wholly fail to give us a likeness of Lincoln, but the portrait can be made unreal in numerous details, and Mr. Dixon spoils the impressiveness and effectiveness of his by giving us a too wordy Lincoln. Much of his laconic humor is lacking, the sublime sorrow of the man's almost unhuman burden verges too close upon the pathos of melodrama to move us as we have been moved with his portrait drawn by other and more reverent hands. As a novelist Mr. Dixon has no distinction, because sympathy, truth, sincerity are qualities that do not make his fiction a living, compelling presentation of the facts of life." W. S. B.

And sometimes he makes the president express himself with less direct simplicity and with a more liberal use of adjectives than was his wont. It is a fictional portrait worthy to be added to the gallery of the great president, for he moves through these pages not as a mythical figure, but as a man of flesh and blood, of humor, pathos and rugged strength and moral grandeur. The novel as a whole has not the breadth of Winston Churchill's civil war story, 'The crisis,' nor can it compare, indeed, it does not seek to, in the vividness of its battle scenes with the epic qualities of Miss Mary Johnston's 'Long roll' and 'Cease firing,' but it is worth reading."

DOSTOIEVSKI, FEDOR MIKHAILOVITCH. The Idiot; from the Russian by Constance Garnett. *$1.50 (½c) Macmillan 13-17100

Against the chaotic background of Russian life presented in this plotless novel, one figure stands supreme, limned by a master's hand. This is the figure of Prince Myshkin, rescued by years of careful treatment, from epilepsy and idiocy, but left with a mind and soul so simplified and clarified that he seems a very incarnation of truth. Unquestioning trust in his due from all who come in contact with him, and his influence on characters both vicious and depraved is marked. In the end, however, the strain of contact with a mad world is too much for him; he sinks back into a state of mental darkness.

The author "has lived so much abroad, he has travelled in so many 'primitive' lands where the seamy side has become manifest to him, that his attention is drawn to qualities which contrast unfavourably with those prevailing in England or western Europe. . . . Dr. Douglas's sphere is that which is too often appropriated by the mere sentimentalist, and as such is discredited in 'serious' circles. But he himself is not a sentimentalist. He is an artist who is not concerned with the half-truths of the sentimentalist or the politician. If he finds things to praise in Tunisia, we may be sure that is because there are things worth praising there. . . . He attributes half the evils of this country to Mohammed and the Mohammedan governments of the past." (Ath)

"The author's singular detachment and penetration make the work one of the most interpretative of this country, and his style has unusual vividness and charm. Only for scholarly readers."

+ A L A Bkl 9:236 F '13

"Mr. Douglas has found a new way of writing about travel; that is to say, he has returned to the way of ancient travellers who wrote with natural disgust of inhospitable and inferior civilizations, without the uncritical tolerance of modern altruism; and he has added the modern aesthetic feeling of one who has viewed life self-consciously. His style reminds us somewhat of Mr. Conrad's; nevertheless, it is his own. It lends itself to the sensuous description of external beauty, to delicate nuances of irony, to cold, even brutal, statements of fact. Mr. Douglas is a stylist in the important sense of the term—he has something to say which admits of expression in distinguished prose."

DOW, ARTHUR WESLEY. Theory and practice of teaching art. 2d ed il $1.50 Teachers college 12-27942

The method of teaching advocated by the author is designated "a synthetic method"; a method of building up given material such as lines, shapes, tones, and colors into forms of aesthetic expression. This method is contrasted with what is termed the analytic or academic method, which consists in drawing from nature to acquire a knowledge of facts of appearance, and skill in representing these facts. . . . The remaining two books tell of the rule of the Arabian conquerors and their fall, and departure from Spain. . . . The translator has added footnotes from modern authorities; and it is remarkable to what extent Dozy's facts and estimates are confirmed by modern scholars. DREISER, THEODORE. Traveler at forty. 11 12 $1.80 (1c) Century

Readers of "Sister Carrie" and "The financier," who know that Theodore Dreiser views life thru no glasses of rose color, will not expect to find in this book any of the glamor of romance thru which other travelers have seen the old world. They will find little notice given to Westminster or the Tower, but will find descriptions of Piccadilly at one in the morning, with its drab women and disillusioned men; descriptions of the demi-monde of Paris, and of the night life of Berlin. This is a realistic book of travels, but it is not concerned only with the ugly side of life. Glimpses of a Christmas celebration in an English country home and other sketches of Italy, Switzerland and Holland are delightful.

DRINKWATER, JOHN. William Morris. *$2.50. (6c) Kennerley (Eng ed 13-450)

This critical study of William Morris is, in a way, an answer to the common charge that as a poet he alienated himself from the life of his time and evaded the problems that were troubling it. "Nothing is further from the truth than the common assertion that Morris in his art turned from a life of realities to a dream-world. . . . His one overmastering passion was for a world wherein men and women lived in full responsiveness to the beauty of the earth . . . finding joy in their work." (Introductory chapter) An introductory chapter and a conclusion offer a criticism of Morris and his work as a whole, and six intervening chapters consider the individual works.

DUDENEY, MRS. HENRY ERNEST. Runaway ring. *$1.25 Duffield (Eng ed 13-1904)

This "is a book where the secret lives of men and women are pictured. The author's methods are merciless. On the one side she shows us romance as represented by Frusanah, the elderly, disreputable sister of an ecclesiastical dignitary, and on the other there is stability as represented by old Mrs. Baigent and her numerous offspring, the children of one whom society must have chosen for honour in any show of British matrons. . . . In a simple summary the story of Frusanah is sordid, and Mrs. Dudeney does nothing to varnish it in all her chapters, yet the light of romance is left shining over the woman who could not even redeem life by death. It is rather like the illumination given by tapers to an ugly corpse. Fanny married young Mr. Baigent. . . . The spirit of Frusanah, which was romantic and ill regulated, did battle with the Baigents, who were all stable and well regulated, and their contention was for the body and soul of Fanny."—Sat R

In his first chapter the author expresses the optimistic belief that we are about to see the end of the materialistic age in which we live. The worship of mammon, the mad rush for money, now prevalent, are to give way before the "re-enfranchisement of spiritual ideals in the minds and hearts of men." The chapters that follow are: What all the world believes; An inherent endowment; The house not made with hands; The three cosmic spheres; The great assize; The eternal harvest; The Father's house; The land where we shall know; The disclosures of the Christ.

"The author is not whole-hearted in welcoming criticism, for he tells us that the professional study of the Bible is the soil in which 'destructive criticism' grows and flourishes, without explaining how truth can be destroyed and not established by criticism.  Finances of Ireland before the union and

The author is a supporter of Irish home rule. "His argument throughout this book is that, first and last, Ireland has been bled by the financial arrangements between the two countries. . . . Especially convincing is his exposure of the manner in which during the years between the Union and the amalgamation of the two Exchequers, the smaller island was saddled with an enormous debt which, left to herself, she would never have contracted. Lord Dunraven holds the view that the granting of Home rule would not lessen the strength of the case for restitution." (Ath)

"In setting down his facts and making his deductions he displays a remarkable temperance, judiciousness, and love of accuracy. The subject bristles with difficulties, and in many departments of it his interpretations of the facts would be contested by men of another school. "The 'Report' is something more than an incident in Canadian history. It marks a new era in English colonial policy. It partakes somewhat of the character of the Magna charta and of the Federalist: it is at once the charter of Canadian freedom and an able exposition of the principles of colonial administration. It made the Empire possible and made it free." (Am Pol Sci R) "The present edition consists of an introduction, mainly historical, by Sir Charles Lucas; the report itself, with valuable notes by the editor; and a reprint of about one-third of the original appendixes, two or three letters from the correspondence, and a hitherto unpublished account of Lord Durham's mission, written in 1840 by Charles Buller the ablest member of his staff." (Eng Hist R)

"The work of the editor has on the whole been faithfully performed. He frequently, however, conveys the impression that he holds a brief for Downing street. "Of the editor's share in the work, the notes are numerous, accurate, and to the point. The introduction is scholarly with many of the happy phrases and sentences which we expect from Sir Charles Lucas; his discussion of the constitutional importance of improvements in transportation is especially good. The general point of view is that of a moderate and fair-minded defender of the British government in general and of the colonial office in particular. EARLE, FERDINAND, ed. Lyric year. *$2
 1 Kennerley 13-35066

A volume of representative American verse. "The lyric year," says its editor, "aspires to the position of an 'annual exhibition' or 'Salon' of American poetry, for it presents a selection from one year's work of a hundred American poets." Ten thousand poems by nearly two thousand writers were examined by the editor who in making his selection "endeavored to give preference to poems fired with the Time spirit and marked by some special distinction, rather than mere technical performances." To three of the poems in the collection "Second avenue," by Orrick Johns; "To a thrush," by T. A. Daly; and "Ode to Robert Browning," by George Stirling, prizes to the amount of $1000 were awarded.

"A significant collection of American verse."

+ A L A Bkl 9:281 Mr '13

"Although there are thus many interesting and even beautiful poems—and the list might be considerably extended—it must be admitted that the impression produced by the collection as a whole is one of mediocrity."

+ — Bookm 37:192 Ap '13 2050w

"I have read through the book, as every educated American will—or should—read through it, and many an Englishman in his own country, eager to know what has been done over-seas with the language of Shakespeare. It is possible to find some fault with what has been done—facile praise has little value; but it is impossible not to find also both promise and fulfilment of a high order; something to be proud of—almost arrogantly proud; something to be grateful for, as one is grateful for a Lincoln, or a Whitman, or any superb manifestation of the nation's genius. There have been some suspicions that the soul of America was becoming flat, but the sky will not cave in while there are such poets to uphold it, with the stars shining, as 'The lyric year' reveals." "Throughout the volume it is quite evident that the editors were totally oblivious to matters of metrical technique and choice diction. The book is a disappointment. To measure its value by any real poetry is futile. What is here collected is current magazine verse not of the best order. Using the little Oxford volume of 1880, 'Love in idleness,' as a touchstone, one may see how dull and imitative—and worse, commonplace—is the tone of this little volume."

EASTMAN, MAX. Child of the Amazons, and other poems. *$1 Kennerley 13-10637

One long poem and a number of lyrics make up the contents of this volume. The title poem tells the story of a daughter of the Amazons who finding herself facing a choice, places fealty to her group before the right to individual happiness. "Yet though she yields, it is with high protest against the law of Artemis, and with prescient forecast of a time to come when sharp severance between two normal forms of self-expression shall no longer be the woman's lot." (Survey)

"Mr. Eastman's book is interesting in itself, and as an illustration of a tendency evident in much modern verse, the tendency toward what may be called the social interpretation of nature. His verse has a splendid pictorial quality and he writes with vigor and sincerity."

+ Lit D 46:1348 Je 14 '13 350w

"It must be that Mr. Max Eastman means to convey something in particular by the title poem, but we are free to confess we don't know just what it is. And in the contemporary wilderness of rank 'vers libres' whose authors mistake nebulous emotion for the end instead of the beginning of poetry, and take the name of Whitman in vain as an excuse for indolent evasion of necessary rhythmic duties, these clearly and carefully wrought poems with their precision of phrasing bring pleasure and relief. Not that Mr. Eastman is always master of his instrument. Especially in the blank verse, there are annoying lapses, jolts and breaks that pull one up short." V. D. Scudder.

He pleads not for the understanding or the appreciation of poetry but for its enjoyment, and insists that to be enjoyed poetry must be experienced, saying that it is "like religion in that it exists with glorious definition for those who have attained it, but for those who merely look upon it, there is little that appears."

"Mr. Eaton's book is a clearly written exposition (and in some instances criticism) of the Interstate commerce commission's rules for railway accounting. . . . Some 220 pages of the book are divided into eight chapters which take up in logical order: Capital and income accounts, Maintenance-of-way and structures, Maintenance of equipment, Traffic expenses, Transportation, General expenses, Outside operations, Additions and betterments. Each chapter is subdivided into compact paragraphs with bold-faced type headings, so as to do everything possible to bring order out of the chaos, which is all the uninitiated see in the elaborate accounting and statistical analysis of the transportation industry. The following 200 pages are reprints of the Interstate commerce commission's rules, abridged and systematically arranged. The remaining 150 pages, nearly one-third of the book comprise a very complete and thorough index."—Engin N

EDGAR, MATILDA, LADY. Colonial governor⁸ in Maryland: Horatio Sharpe and his times, 1753-1773. il *$3.50 Longmans 12-31021

This "is a discursive treatment of colonial affairs in Maryland during the twenty years from 1753 to 1773, with Gov. Horatio Sharpe as the central figure." (Nation) "The materials for the book have been taken from the Sharpe correspondence, contemporary newspapers, and private sources." (Ath)

"As the main title of this book is 'A colonial governor,' and as Sharpe's administration covered a period peculiarly adapted to the study of the position, functions, and problems of a colonial governor, it is a little disappointing to find that the author has failed to give a very clear idea of the governor as such—

of his relation to assembly, proprietor, and crown. This relation appears incidentally in the material given, but it is left mainly for the reader to do the constructive work if he would understand the office of colonial governor." E. I. McCormack.

"The one serious criticism that can be made upon Lady Edgar's book is that it strays too far from Sharpe and his colony. Ellen Flamartin's likeness to the progenitress of all heroines lies in a certain weakness in yielding to the promptings of curiosity. At the age of thirteen it moves her to open a note intrusted to her for delivery by a young criminal who accidentally crosses her path; nine years later in London she is impelled by the same force to look at a picture in her lover's possession which identifies him in memory with the law-breaker of the childhood's episode. Ellen, a Canadian by birth, is taken to England to be educated. Leaving Girtton, she plunges into the suffrage movement, zealous for its success; but love and approaching marriage turn her from it; on the occasion of her engagement she renounces all interest in the cause.

The story opens with a Junior prom scene at Princeton, but its action shifts presently to a western ranch where the young hero, Jack Holliday, goes after his dismissal from college on a charge of which he is not guilty. There are two girls in the story, Violet, the eastern girl whom Jack has loved from boyhood, and Margaret, the westerner, whom he meets in his later wanderings; and if the reader closes the book with just a touch of disappointment at its ending it will be because Jack has married the one when he so obviously should have fallen in love with the other. The story is tinged somewhat with mysticism.

"The chief unifying feature of the book is the author's conception of society. Society he defines as a group of individuals carrying on a collective life by means of mental interaction. In consequence the fundamental task of the sociologist becomes the study of the continuously changing coordinations or coadaptations of the activities of the members of groups and of the relations of groups to the environment. . . . The first six chapters discuss the conceptions, methods and problems of sociology and the relation of sociology to other sciences. Later chapters treat of the origin of society, social coordination, social self-control, the rôle of instinct, feeling, intellect, imitation and sympathy in the social life, the social mind and forms of association. The final topics are entitled social order, progress and the nature of society."—Science

"It is so easy to pick out what is favorable and to neglect other interpretations that great care is needed to prevent one-sided conclusions. Such care our author has not taken. It is hard to determine whether he has erred because of carelessness or dogmatism. "It is rare that the writer's judgment seems to us to go wrong. We find it harder to follow him in his estimate of Shelley's longer poems than in any other part of the book. Attention should be called, in conclusion, to the extremely valuable bibliographical notes at the end of each volume. It is worthy of remark that unlike most of his countrymen, Professor Elton shows a thorough familiarity with the work of research which has been done outside of Great Britain."

"He has written an accurate and learned survey of the period, and his criticisms of individual authors, if not always facile in expression, are frequently incisive and illuminating. But where Mr. Elton had splendid opportunities to add to our understanding by estimating international influences we have sometimes been disappointed." E. H. Wright.

+ — N Y Times 17:785 D 22 '12 2900w

"He has made his book somewhat heavy reading by dilating on the historical as well as the artistic aspects of his authors. He knows so much and elaborates so much that the total impression of his view of a notable figure is sometimes difficult to grasp. But, by the way, he generally says something so essentially right and witty or selects so illuminating a passage as the true guide to its author's thought that we cannot afford to leave a word unread. The notes at the end of each volume are amazingly full and complete. They afford a clue to all the best editions as well as a host of fugitive papers and criticisms. Examining them with deliberate care, we can suggest no material additions, and in one case only have we happened on a slip—Joseph Knight was an excellent Wordsworthian, but not the editor of Wordsworth."

+ — Sat R 114:646 N 23 '12 1400w

"Through more than eight hundred closely printed pages the writer's clarity of judgment and power of enjoyment never flag. He gives us closely reasoned criticism, every step thought out, every sentence a fresh effort of appraisement. The gusto of the book is infectious. The reader lays it down with a new zest for literature—a unique achievement for a volume of literary history. The manner of writing is worthy of the matter. Most histories of literature are only for reference; here is one on a large scale, which any lover of books will read from end to end with keen enjoyment."

In these years of the Mexican war, the Fugitive slave act, of Emerson's successful lecturing tour in England, we find the sage sometimes torn between motives." The synoptical tables of contents and the page-headings serve, as in the earlier volumes, to direct the reader quickly to what will most interest him." (Dial)

ERSKINE, MRS. PAYNE. Joyful Heatherby. il *$1.35 (1c) Little 13-626

Joyful Heatherby is the sweet, romance-scented name of the heroine. She is a country girl as the name suggests, a girl of the New England coast who lives with an old seafaring grandfather. To their little village comes Mark Thorn, a discouraged artist who has grown weary of the attempt to hold to his ideals in the face of commercialism and the false values of society. There are many other characters in the story—village and fisher folk, men and women of the upper strata of society, and strange people of the underworld who beset the little country girl's way when she ventures into the unknown city.

"As melodramatic and amateurish as 'The mountain girl,' but in the country portions has considerable merit, and, as a story, will please readers who like a large amount of sentiment."

She slaughters the people who stand in the way of her heroine's harrowing experiences with the ruthlessness that marks the end of Hamlet; she indulges in ingenious phantasies about the abodes of vice; she deprives her hero and her heroine of all remnants of common sense and contrives a tale which is absurd in its sensationalism and in some places repulsive. The book contains one good character of which more might have been made."

"In the mediocre fashion 'Joyful Heatherby' is interesting; it, too, has in it much that is sweet. But its incident is melodramatic and commonplace, its characters are exaggerated, its author's style is incoherent at best. It lacks the skill and the charm of 'The mountain girl,' and Mrs. Erskine has given free rein to the tendency that came near to spoiling the earlier book—the willingness to sacrifice natural charm to strained adventure. Mrs. Erskine would delight her readers mightily if she were not so anxious to 'thrill.'"

The life story of the author of "Confessions of a railroad signalman" and "Labor and the railroads." "We are led from a humble home in Scotland to South America, South Africa, and finally to New England, as we follow the steps by which Mr. Fagan has arrived at his full development as a railroad signalman, an investigator of labor problems, and a writer on social movements." (Ind) His life during these wanderings "was not eventful enough to be of any general interest, and has its significance only in the fact that in the author's belief incidents of that period profoundly affected his thinking and influenced the development of his philosophy. That philosophy applied to the railway industry is simply a plea for the restoration of the freedom of the individual—freedom from the red tape of officialdom, and from the tyranny of the labor union—and for a closer and more personal relation between the directing force of the railway and its employees." FAIRBANKS, CHARLES BULLARD. My unknown chum "Aguecheek"; with a foreword by H: Garrity. *$1.50 (1½c) Devin-Adair co. 12-21670

An old book published a number of years ago with the title "Aguecheek" is now issued with the title noted above. Mr. Garrity in his preface tells how the book came into his possession in 1878 and how after passing its delights on to others by loaning his own copy he was persuaded to bring out this new edition that the book might reach a wider audience. The first part of the work, "Sketches of foreign travel" describes the London, Paris and Rome of fifty years ago. The second part is made up of essays on books, travel and conduct of life.

"The reading public as a whole, and particularly Boston readers, owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Garrity whose fine spirit appreciated so greatly the writings of Charles Bullard Fairbanks, that he was not satisfied until he had rescued them from oblivion."

+ Boston Transcript p25 D 18 '12 750w

"The qualities that have kept it alive in the affections of many who welcomed it years ago, and have made one enthusiastic admirer re-issue it now, may be found in a certain piquancy of style, a knack of apt illustration, some delightful gossip of old persons and places that are now only memories, a philosophical outlook upon travel, the value of which persists after the information is out of date. The mere fact that the scenes pictured here have passed away adds to its charm. To those who knew the Boston and New York, the London and Paris and Rome of fifty years ago, it will bring back many a tender recollection. The reputed author of the book is Charles B. Fairbanks, a New England convert, and we think that his authorship has been too easily set aside in the preface."

FALLS, J. C. EWALD. Three years in the Libyan desert (Kaufmann expedition); tr. by Elisabeth Lee. il *$4.50 Herder

"The object of the Kaufmann expedition was 'to rediscover the highly important, long, and vainly-sought early Christian sanctuary in the Libyan desert, the Tomb of St. Menas.' . . . Backed by the moral support of the influential Schiess Pascha, the president of the Alexandrian antiquities commission, they obtained permission from the Egyptian government to excavate the ruins of what has been aptly called 'The Egyptian Lourdes.' Dr. Bode of the Berlin museum and other friends furnished the money, and the two archaeologists spent the next three years unearthing the tomb of St. Menas, the Constantine church, the Arcadius basilica, the baptistry and consignatorium, and the baths of Menas. In all the rooms of the baths water vessels were found, and many of the well-known Menas ampullae, on which were written invocations to the saint. Just as at Lourdes to-day, the pilgrims of this fourth century shrine bathed in the baths of St. Menas, and carried home some of the water with them to use in sickness."—Cath World

FARNOL, JEFFERY. Amateur gentleman. 1l *$1.40 (½c) Little 13-35198

The amateur gentleman is Barnabas, son of John Barty who was once known as "Glorious John," ex-champion of England; and the story tells how the lad desisted from following his father's profession to go to London and make his way in the world of fashion. It recounts his rise and his fall and his return to his father's inn. On the first day of his adventuring Barnabas fell in love and won a friend; and these two precious things, love and friendship, he retains to the end. "Written sixteen years ago, translated at that time into English, but for some reason failing to meet with popular success and known to but very few American readers, the present translation introduces us to what is practically a new book, though it antedates 'On the branch' and 'The unknown isle.' The story itself is as unoriginal as a news item; an American heiress goes to France, marries an impoverished nobleman, makes a place for herself in the Faubourg St. Germain, and lives to do the one thing she had declared impossible—to learn that her husband is unfaithful to her and to forgive him." —N Y Times

"The author claims that the method explained in this volume abbreviates and simplifies very materially the work of surveyors and navigators. . . . The first fifty pages explain very fully the theory, and numerous examples are given to show its application. The remaining 450 pages are occupied with tables, to the compilation of which the author has given nineteen years." FERNANDEZ GUARDIA, RICARDO. History of the discovery and conquest of Costa Rica; tr. by Harry Weston Van Dyke. il *$3 (3½c) Crowell 13-19316

A work translated from the Spanish in which the author gives "intimate pen portraits of many of the doughty conquistadores and tales of romantic historical interest. The principal source from which the author has taken his material is that treasure-house of the American historian—the archives of the Indies at Seville." (Translator's introduction) That our traditional view of the early Spanish conquerors as treacherous and cruel despoilers is to a large extent a mistaken view is the translator's contention. One aim of this book is to clear away such misapprehensions.

"As an illuminating and comprehensive history of the process through which Central America evolved into its present day divisions, and particularly of the beginnings of the civilization and settlement of Costa Rica, the volume is an acquisition to historical libraries." F. W. F.

"The forty-three different selections which comprise Professor Fetter's volume are arranged under seven headings as follows: Markets and prices; Wealth and its uses; Capital and investment; Labor and population; Costs, profits, and monopoly; Private incomes and social welfare; The state and industry. . . . More than two thirds of the selections are culled from a wide range of public documents and reports of governmental and voluntary organizations, while but very few are taken from the ordinary secondary sources. Each extract is designed to correspond with a principle or a concept of the science. . . . Brief editorial notes precede each selection, making more certain the student's grasp of the chief point at issue."—Am Econ R

"The readings present concrete facts lying beneath the more important concepts and principles, and illustrate them in an interesting and illuminating manner. A reading book for use in connection with the text on principles should accomplish at least two results: it should give the student, within the space limits permitted, the widest possible knowledge of economic structure; and it should help to give him a livelier interest in the analysis of principles than can be given by the study of the usual textbook alone. FIGGIS, DARRELL. Broken arcs. *$1.35 (½c) 1 Kennerley A13-1477

A new story built upon the old, old theme of the country girl who goes out into the world to love and be betrayed. Cast off by her own father she finds friends in a noble man and woman who take her into their home and help to build up a new life for her. A new love comes to her but this time the man proves to be of the earth earthy and it is she who is called on to forgive failings and digressions from the path of righteousness. Out of the broken arcs of these two lives the author tries to give promise of a perfect whole.

"In short, while the novel has power, and while we are anxious to take Mr. Figgis as one of the serious literary workers, this is after all nothing which will give him a higher standing than the veriest hack-fictionist who never bumped into G. K. C.!"

FIGGIS, JOHN NEVILLE. Civilization at the cross roads. *$1.60 Longmans 12-32224

Four lectures delivered originally at Harvard university as the 1911 lectures under the William Belden Noble foundation. The author's subjects may be summed up under two heads. First, a contemptuous but intensely serious and interesting arraignment of our present civilization, in which he desires Christianity to have next to no part; and, secondly, a fervent but somewhat partizan defence of orthodox Christianity. . . . Professor Figgis's extremely pessimistic view of the present loss of influence suffered by Christianity results largely from the restricted notions he professes of what that religion is. . . . But if our author takes a dark view of the present, he is not without hope for the future. The Christian church will, he believes, triumph again, and the present attitude of mind which ignores the instincts and cravings of the human heart, accepts money as the consolation for all evils, and trusts to the intellect as the sole guide and explanation of life, will prove, he thinks transitory." A well illustrated work giving "the published story of the record-breaking climb of the Duke of the Abruzzi in the Karakoram Himalayas. His effort was one of success and of failure. Success in reaching the highest mountain altitude ever achieved by man . . . and failure in that he gave up as hopeless his purpose of climbing Mount Godwin-Austen and also that he fell short by 510 feet of attaining the summit of Bride Peak, his final objective. . . . The real object of the expedition was not so much to secure a 'record' as to study the effects of reduced atmospheric pressure upon the human system." A story that pictures Scotch domestic life. "We live through the mechanism of several households, a generation grows up in them under our eyes. The drawing is done with much adroitness, and without gloomy intent; the households are of common-place well-to-do families, Scots certainly, but not oppressively virtuous, and with cupboards singularly free from skeletons. Yet the only establishment in which gloom does not find an honoured harbourage is feckless, slovenly, and something worse than irregular." FISHER, HERBERT ALBERT LAURENS.

Napoleon. (Home university library of modern knowledge) *50c (1c) Holt 13-6360
"Mr. Fisher attempts to give merely an outline of Napoleon's career and to fill in these rather sketchy boundaries with an account of the man himself and a study of his character. Comparatively little of the space is devoted to his military campaigns and achievements. . . . It is Napoleon himself, as a man, as General and as Emperor, that Mr. Fisher is concerned with, and his method of treatment is to make the activities he recounts, whether of peace or war, help to elucidate his problem."—N Y Times

FISHER, IRVING. Elementary principles of economics. 3d ed il *$2 Macmillan 12-15936

The volume "may be described as an excellent introduction to Prof. Fisher's other works, but hardly as an elementary textbook." (Ath)
"The scheme of the book differs from the ordinary one on the subject in that the time-honored order of topics—production, exchange, distribution, consumption—has not been followed, but rather the ideas of capital, income, prices, interest and money. The aim of the book is the inculcation of principles and not the mere presentation of facts. The establishment of relationships—the teaching to think—is the main object kept constantly in view. Emphasis is laid upon money and prices, and here we have a reflection of the author's particular interest in those subjects. Another special feature is the abundant use of curves to illustrate the principles under discussion." (Boston Transcript)

"It is instructive, stimulating, and ably written; it contains a great deal of new material, and presents new points of view. On the other hand, it scarcely justified its name, because, in the first place, it is not elementary; and, in the second place, it discusses only a few principles, and they seem to be confined mainly to certain favorite theories of the author which he had already set forth in other books." T. N. Carver.

+ Am Econ R 3:620 S '13 1200w

"Looking at the text-book as a whole, it seems to suffer largely from its omissions of starting-points commonly accepted as being vital. It is difficult to get the social point of view of the whole economic field, and as a groundwork of dynamic economic theory, the volume would have to be correlated with reference reading of large scope. On the contrary, it has exceptional merit in its treatment of income, prices and theories of money, and as a whole represents a scholarly attempt to break down the common tradition of distrust against economic study." The story is concerned with two rival artists, each of whom is trying for a salon prize. They employ the same model, Adrea Varrick, a girl of great beauty. One of the two, Julius Lavigne, is "the man who 'saw wrong,' which being interpreted means that he distorts the lives and motives of everyone, especially his subjects; he even looks into their souls and falsifies those on his canvas; in spite of all this he is a very great artist whose work attracts widespread attention." (Boston Transcript) By trickery he wins the prize. There is a bit of detective work in the course of the story.

Mr. Fiske's hope, expressed in the preface, that his book, because it makes available the results of the Thirteenth census, will commend itself to general readers who are interested in the rural life movement is not unfounded, for the volume is a clear statement of rural social conditions, their significance in American life."—Survey

He describes briefly the artistic, historical and literary shrines along that route. The many illustrations from photographs are carefully reproduced and explained in legends. A chapter on New York and its skyscrapers rounds out the book and a collection of tips to the tourist sums up one phase of the author's experience.

The book presents the substance of a course in philosophy worked out in the class room. It is the result of the author's desire to present a course that would be both critical and constructive. He says: "It is agreed that the teacher of philosophy is not to aim to give his students information concerning philosophy and philosophers; he should induce them to philosophize. . . . Up to the measure of his ability the student is to become a philosopher; and, in endeavoring to secure this, we are to keep in mind the fact that a true philosophy is not merely a theory of the universe, it is a personal relating of the self to all that is." An historical introduction of fourteen chapters precedes the discussion of the elements of philosophy. The author's personal point of view is that of objective realism.

The four problems presented are: The oath of the tennis court June 20, 1789; The royal session of June 23, 1789; The insurrection of October 5 and 6, 1789; The flight of the king, June 20, 1791.

FORD, JAMES. Co-operation in New England, urban and rural; introd. by Francis G. Peabody. $1.50 (3c) Survey associates 13-1318

The survey, made under the direction of the Russell Sage foundation, of which this volume presents the results, was begun in 1907 and followed a year's study by the author of similar enterprises in Europe. "It was found advisable to limit the research to the main types of co-operation: associations for the production and distribution of the immediate necessities of life." (Author's preface) Part one considers Co-operative associations of workmen; Part two, Co-operative associations of farmers. FORMAN, JUSTUS MILES. Opening door. il *$1.30 (1½c) Harper 13-8077

A novel offering a sane and temperate interpretation of the woman movement. Hope Standish, a young girl just out of a fashionable finishing school, destined for a debutante season and a career in society, is drawn, almost against her will into the ranks of workers for equal suffrage. She makes a failure as a platform speaker, falls in love, marries, becomes a happy mother, and believes that she has abandoned the "cause" forever. But she finds that she is still enlisted in its ranks, finds new ways of working for it, not antagonistic to her other duties, and convinces a doubting husband of its justness and reasonableness.

FORREST, ARCHIBALD STEVENSON. Tour through South America. 1l *$3 Pott

"Mr. Forrest's volume touches upon the history of each South American state and describes with brevity its present condition and resources. His is a practical book, intended for readers who want solid, present-day facts against a background of past events. Beginning with the isthmus, to which with the canal, he devotes a hundred or more pages, he goes into the history of each country and each city that he visits with considerable detail, following its story from the first that is known of it down to the present time." (N Y Times)

"Mr. Forrest is both an artist and an author. He has illustrated his book with nearly a hundred and fifty sketches of scenes, portraits and groups to enliven the descriptions of his pen." (Boston Transcript)

"The author has put the historical portion of his work together, and told of the exploits of Vasco Nuñez de Balboa and other early adventurers in so attractive a style that this part of his tale (often in other books the 'dry' part) will appeal to schoolboys as much as to their elders. His excellent drawings are a relief from the photographs which nowadays are the usual form of illustration for books of travel."

In his preface the author says: "Whatever freshness of thought this essay may possess will be found in the fact that the problem of life after death is viewed from the standpoint of the twentieth century and is discussed in terms of the special difficulties and the prevailing attitudes which exist to-day." There are three chapters. In the first, The significance of immortality, he points out the present significance of the problem. The second, The possibility of immortality, is a criticism of the arguments commonly urged against a future life; and the third, The assurance of immortality, is a presentation of the positive position in favor of belief in life after death.

FOSTER, MAXIMILIAN. Whistling man. 1l 12 *$1.30 Appleton 13-16790

"A well-written mystery story. . . . From the moment when the tale begins—in a little French inn on a night of furious wind and rain—until its close in a great financier's private office in Wall street—on a day when panic rages more destructive than wind or rain—surprise is heaped upon surprise, complication added to complication, so that the perplexed reader can see no way out of the tangle. The story contains love and loyalty, treachery and murder, involving more than one beautiful woman and more than one financial giant. Much of the action takes place in a luxurious country house on the Hudson, yet at one time in the narrative the hero lacks carefare. And he is an engaging hero, too, less stupid than the majority of his kin."—N Y Times

"The book is typical of the clearly conceived and carelessly executed mystery story which so outnumbers the exquisitely composed Lecoq type. "Joseph Fouché was minister of police under Napoleon, chief 'protector of the law' in the social system of both Consulate and Empire. He suppressed the discussions of the political clubs and forbade the freedom of the press. He helped to consummate the 'coup d'état.' He joined with all the strength of his police force in conspiracies to raise Napoleon to higher and higher power, he protected social vice for a financial consideration, and he laid a secret but official tax on gambling. He placed his friends in office and he bribed gayly on all sides. . . . And with all of this he had an overpowering respect that no modern Commissioner could surpass for what he called the 'moral aim of the police'; and he made the efficiency of his Paris force a by-word the world over." (N Y Times) When these memoirs were published in 1824 they were supposed to be the work of Fouché himself; later they were attributed to Alphonse de Beauchamp. It now seems probable, on good authority, that Beauchamp's work was based on Fouché's own notes and papers.

This volume "is a statement of Christian belief in terms of modern thought by seven Oxford men, all of whom have had experience as university teachers of theology or philosophy. The keynote of the book is found from the following sentence from the Introduction: 'The world is calling for religion; but it cannot accept a religion if its theology is out of harmony with science, philosophy and scholarship. Religion, if it is to dominate life, must satisfy both the head and the heart, a thing which no obscurantism or rationalism can do.'—Educ R

"As Mr. Streeter tells us in his interesting preface, they have tried to avoid all discussions purely technical, and to write in a way that shall appeal to the average educated man. Generally they have succeeded. If some parts are dull and others rather commonplace, there is hardly anything that can be called recondite or esoteric. On the whole, the book is interesting and very readable, and in some parts of it a great deal more. Many, we hope, will profit by Mr. Talbot's picture of present-day conditions, and more will discuss the debatable topics raised by Mr. Streeter, Mr. Temple, and Mr. Rawlinson."

Shall it go to the white race or the yellow race? If to the white race, will it be under the British flag, or the flag of the United States, or of some other nation? That is the problem of the Pacific." FRANCE, ANATOLE, pseud. Gods are athirst; tr. by Alfred R. Allinson. *$1.75 Lane

13-9205

A story of the French revolution which shows the deterioration of character in a man who attempts to administer to the thirst of the gods. Evariste Gamelin, an artist who has taken up the cause of the republic, is appointed a juror of the revolutionary tribunal. "Of a dreamy and idealistic temperament, he listens to Robespierre and is carried away by the lofty abstractions and the inquisitorial casuistry of the 'sea-green Incorruptible.' Gradually imbued with a mystical sense of his mission, he comes to regard himself as a veritable priest of the guillotine, whose sacred duty it is to kill, kill, kill! until the last enemy of France is eliminated." (N Y Times) With the fall of Robespierre Evariste is condemned and dies on the guillotine to which he has sacrificed countless others.

"Mr. Allinson's translation is accurate enough to give the author's meaning, but it strips his writing of its charm, and leaves the story an almost unrelieved history of foredoomed fanaticism, too pitiful to read."

— + Ath 1913,1:620 Je 7 70w

"In his new book he reveals himself as we have always known him: infinitely intelligent, ironical, subtle, rather inclined to paradox, true spiritual son of Voltaire and Renan. We can but admire one of the most successful attempts that has ever been made to bring nearer to us, without deforming it, an epoch whose influence dominates our entire life of to-day." Edouard Herriot.

FRANCE, ANATOLE, pseud. (JACQUES-ANTOINE THIBAUT). Jocasta and The famished cat; tr. by Agnes Farley. *$1.75 Lane A13-1458

Two of the author's early tales, written some thirty-five years ago, have been translated for this volume. "'Jocasta' is a 'thriller.' It is done, as is oftentimes the case with a young man's work, in somewhat broad and simple strokes. To use a current idiom, it has the 'punch.' . . . It has rather a theatrical plot, revels in a deep-dyed villain, and shows a generous stream of humanity in its humor. . . . The early France, in 'The famished cat,' somewhat in the spirit of the author of the immortal 'Tristram Shandy,' rejoices in the portrayal of the scatter-brained." (N Y Times)

"The late Mrs. Farley's translation of this early work of Anatole France is adequate, though there are a few slips which she would no doubt have corrected if she had lived to see the proofs. 'The famished cat' represents the author's humour better than 'Jocasta'; also it is the better rendering."

FRANCK, HARRY ALVERSON. Zone policeman 88 (Eng. title, Things as they are in Panama). *$2 (3c Century 13-8630)

During his term of service as Zone policeman the author served in two capacities, as enumerator of the census, and, in the ordinary capacity of policeman, as keeper of the peace. It was the privilege of the census enumerator which took him into the homes of the residents, and gave him his intimate inside knowledge of the conglomerate population of the Canal Zone and enabled him to make his "close range study of the Panama canal and its workers." With the census completed, he was given an opportunity to see something of another side of the life of the Zone.

"His impressions are very definite, his experiences well told, but as a whole the book makes a rather slight contribution and has little if any permanent value."

This is a story of the artistic temperament. Manuella Wagner, the daughter of a man of newly acquired millions, after breaking two engagements that are arranged for her by a socially ambitious step-mother, elopes with Harston Migotti, a musical genius. Manuella is eighteen and she learns on the day of her wedding that in the duet of their married life she is always to play the bass; that they two are to be one but that he is the one they must be. auth. tr. of 3d ed., with introd., by A. A. Brill. *$4 Macmillan A13-1646

The "author's main interest is centred upon the thesis that every dream is the fulfilment of an unconscious wish. He conceives of this wish as an active entity which strives to rise into full consciousness and to effect its realization, this being thwarted by the action of another entity which he designates as the 'censor.' The psychic activity in dream formation resolves itself into two functions—the provision of the dream thoughts which are unconscious, and the transformation of these into the dream content." This latter activity is peculiar to dream life and characteristic of it."—Nation

"Prof. Freud writes with a degree of introspection which betrays his Oriental heredity and often leads him into pure mysticism. His conclusions are sometimes far-fetched, and fit the premises incompletely, whilst an atmosphere of sex pervades many parts of the book and renders it very unpleasant reading. The results he reaches are hardly commensurate with the labour expended, and reveal a seamy side of life in Vienna which might well have been left alone."

— + Ath 1913,1:424 Ap 19 550w

"Logically, indeed, Freud is open to attacks on all sides. The ultimate test of Freudism lies not in argument but in its clinical adequacy, and in the ease and simplicity with which it applies to other problems and illuminates other obscurities in the psychological jungle. To me, at least, this 'interpretation of dreams' is quite acceptable in principle and inconclusive in concrete detail." H. M. Kallen.

FROST, WALTER ARCHER. Man between. il 12 *$1.25 (1½c) Doubleday 13-21297

When a South African witch doctor hurls the nGaka's curse on a group of men at their club in Durban, he designates the rich young American as the one who will be the last to die. In a short time, one after another of these men disappear. When the news of the death of Bradbroke, the man between him and "It," reaches him, the American loses heart and calmly awaits his turn. A chance meeting with one of those supposed to be dead reveals the secret of the long train of uncanny happenings and life, happiness, even love becomes possible to the one whose wealth had tempted the others.

FUNK AND WAGNALLS new Standard dictionary of the English language; prepared by more than three hundred and eighty specialists and other scholars, under the supervision of Isaac K. The new Standard, designed, as its title-page states, "to give, in complete and accurate statement, in the light of the most recent advances in knowledge, in the readiest form for popular use, the orthography, pronunciation, meaning and etymology of all the words, and the meaning of idiomatic phrases, in the speech and literature of the English speaking peoples," is a work of something over 2800 pages. Of these 2757 pages are given to the "Dictionary of the English language," in one alphabet of 450,000 words; the remaining pages to an Appendix, devoted to: Disputed pronunciations; Rules for the simplification of spelling; Glossary of foreign words, phrases, etc.; Statistics of population of the world. Proper names, both biographical and geographical, to the number of 65,000, are incorporated in the main alphabet. The illustrations number over 7,000. In the matter of spellings, simplified forms are given preference when two forms are acknowledged by recognized authorities. All simplified spellings recommended by the various reform associations are given, bracketed with the regular forms. English spellings that differ from American are given in the same way. The editors have been liberal in the inclusion of colloquial expressions, slang, and other up-to-date terms, indicating the character of the same by a parenthetical note.

"It is a dictionary to be heartily commended, and if not as full as the Oxford dictionary in the history of words and their derivatives, it has the advantage over it of being complete. The illustrations are many and fully illustrative, and the quotations from authors old and new are sufficient. It is well printed and bound, and can be heartily recommended for the use of schools or for the private library."

+ Ind 76:457 D 4 '13 650w

"The same marvelous ingenuity in the employment of type and other simple mechanical means, for procuring clearness, placing emphasis and saving space marks the 'New standard'; the careful study of any page is an education in what modern typography can do. It is the latest word in the art of dictionary making; it has developed its own peculiar merits admirably and has adopted some good features that marked other dictionaries. For a time at least it can offer many words that no other dictionary contains, even if it cannot keep up with the flood of word creation. In one volume it is too big; we fancy that most persons who use it will prefer the form of two volumes printed on thick paper."

+ + N Y Sun p3 N 1 '13 1150w

"Taking the new edition as a whole, it is difficult to see how it could be bettered as a practical working tool. It gives what one wants in the place where one is most likely to look for it; it puts the most usual usage first, and the etymology last, which is the last thing most people want to know about; most other dictionaries do the opposite. In short, for the present at least, 'Funk and Wagnalls's new Standard dictionary' is the fullest and most practical single volume dictionary of the English language." Joseph Jacobs

She destroys much that the world has long valued, and particularly does she destroy the image worship of the womanly woman of fiction. One may not always agree with her conclusions; but she has admirably succeeded in freeing herself from sex prejudices and superstitions, and she brings to the familiar facts of biology and history an entirely fresh point of view and a remarkable keenness of insight. . . . In the three main divisions of her book—the Biological section, the Historical section, and the Modern section—Mrs. Gallichan discusses the evolution of the woman's part in nature as the guardian of the life force, and therefore as 'the predominant and responsible partner in the relation of the sexes.'"—N Y Times

GALSWORTHY, JOHN. Dark flower. *$1.35 (2c) Scribner 13-21704

A novel which is a keen analysis of the emotional life of a man who, from the age of nineteen, loved at cross purposes. First, in the spring of his life, he is the adoring slave of the unhappy wife of his tutor. The passion of his summer time spends itself agonizingly upon a woman bound to a man she hated. When tragedy ends his hope of her, he gathers up the poor remnants of his broken love and unemotionally offers them to the faithful Sylvia of his boyhood days. His dun-colored married life is disturbed out of its lethargy by the dawning of a bonny Scotch girl upon his horizon. But eventually the dormant manhood in him is stirred into action and he gathers from the wreck of his emotional riot a few solacing offerings for Sylvia.

"Told with a sure insight as keen as it is sympathetic, and with quick touches of exquisite feeling and phrase specially in the first part—youth."

+ A L A Bkl 10:156 D '13

"In his striving after perfect technique, extreme condensation, and every ultimate economy of means, Mr. Galsworthy has perforce sacrificed something of the element of personality, his characters are not individualised with the sharpness of his earlier novels; he has been satisfied to let them be little more than types." "A short play in the usual three acts, in which Mr. Galsworthy elects to write. The action passes in the evening, the morning and the afternoon of two successive days in a balmy December, when hunting is good, in the hall and a morning room of a country house in any of the English shires." (Boston Transcript) "It is a conventional plot treated with the new conscience. An autocratic English baronet is about to force a marriage between an under-gamekeeper and the village girl whom he has wronged, when an embarrassing parallel becomes known in his own family; the heir, having seduced his mother's maid, insists upon marrying her to right the wrong. All the arguments used to constrain the under-keeper are upset when applied to a different station in life; the clergyman, the thinking sister, the father, are confronted by a new aspect to the morality which is fixed enough when applied to the lower classes." "Latin America comprises not only the southern continent, but Mexico, Central America and the West Indies, all the lands settled by Spain. M. Calderon opens his book with a keen and brilliant analysis of the Spanish character, since any full understanding of the continent cannot be had, without an understanding of the people who settled it and held it until a hundred years ago. . . . With directness and simplicity he talks of the race question, finding a certain satisfaction in the thought, that the complete intermixture of the three races on the southern continent, places them farther from a sympathy and understanding with the United States. . . . "It is a study of Dante's mysticism in his great poem, and in its affiliation with representative mystics from St. Augustine to the poet's own time. Noting the distinction between two types of mysticism—a subjective experience, and an objective doctrine from the standpoint of theology, psychology, and poetry—the author finds the whole of the 'Divina commedia' leading up to the supreme utterance of that experience in the final canto of the 'Paradiso.' GARNER, JOHN LESLIE. Caesar Borgia: a study of the renaissance. il. *$3.25. (4½c.) McBride, Nast & co. (Eng ed A13-295)

The author accepts the economic interpretation of history and rejects the "great man theory." Men are the products of history, and Caesar Borgia, the subject of this study, he finds interesting as a product of the egotism of his age. His book is therefore a study of a period rather than of a single character—a period in which "vast, unrestrained selfishness was the predominant characteristic."

"This gives an excellent account of the life of Caesar Borgia but falls into the error common to historians of the period, that is, of expressing judgments which are the result of present-day moral standards far removed from those of the fifteenth century."

A story of boy life in a Catholic school. Tommy, William and Aleck are the three boys who are banded together as the Black brotherhood, bound by solemn vows to stand by one another in times of mischief and of trouble. Yet when time of trouble came—after they had greased the sixth form blackboard with the end of a candle—Aleck failed his friends and could only be brought to a state of penance after a series of intensely exciting events. There are other people in the story—some grown-up people who are woefully lacking in understanding, a sympathetic younger sister and others. It is an unusually well-told story. Boys will like it and much of its humor will please their elders.

"Theresia Cabarrus is to most readers a legend rather than a personality. Known as 'Notre Dame de Thermidor,' she has been glorified by Arsène Houssaye in his book of that title, but M. Gastine subjects her career from the time of her connection with Tallien to a searching examination, the result being to strip her of every good quality. The study has nothing to say of her childhood and early environment; it begins with a brief reference to Theresia's premature marriage to the Marquis de Fontenay, from whom she was soon divorced, and then traces her numerous unions with Tallien, Barras, Ouvrard, and the Comte de Caraman. Nowhere do we find her regarded as a force in the political world. GEIKIE, SIR ARCHIBALD. Love of nature among the Romans during the later decades of the republic and the first century of the empire. *9s Murray (J.), London 13-21513

Upon assuming the presidency of the Classical association in 1911, the Scotch geologist "decided to deliver his president's address on a subject which seemed in some measure to combine the classical interests of the members with his own deep love of nature." (Class J) The address was later expanded into this volume which reviews the references to nature of the Latin poets, often with original translations, under the headings: the love of flowers; the love of animals; Roman gardens; flowers and foliage in Roman art; day and night; the seasons; springs, rivers, and lakes; mountains; the seashores; etc.

"On the kindred subject of the love of nature among the Greeks we have many books, but none that we know approaches in value this mature study of the great Roman poets."

+ Ath 1912,2:158 Ag 17 1600w

"His modest frankness disarms the criticisms of 'the classical scholar' who may regret that in the hint of bibliography on the feeling for nature among the Romans no mention is made of Biese's suggestive work, Schiller's contested dicta, and the recent theses on limited phases of the subject; who is surprised again by the definite location of the Bandusian spring as the source of the Digentia, and who wonders why space is given to sketches of the familiar facts of the lives of Vergil and Horace. 'The classical scholar' as well as 'the ordinary reader' is sure to receive pleasure from the wealth of suggestion in the varied chapters." E. H. Haight.

+ — Class J 8:173 Ja '13 600w

"This is indeed a delightful book, full of contagious zest and charm. The theme is one which has been touched before, notably by Prof. W. R. Hardie in 'Lectures on classical subjects,' published about a dozen years ago, but never has it been handled so thoroughly or with more freshness and suggestiveness than by the President of the Royal Society in this volume, which we confidently commend to scholars and men of science, but still more confidently to the general reader." "Did the Romans really 'love nature' at all in the sense which the phrase would convey to a modern ear? The author brings together whatever evidence exists, but though delightful he is unconvincing. We warmly recommend this notable volume, both for its own great merits and also as a happy proof that the study of modern science and the study of ancient letters are not always or necessarily at variance."

The story traces the brief career of Israel Kalisch from his childhood in Cracow to his death in London streets from the explosion of a bomb thrown by his own hands. Israel's wanderings take him from Cracow to Budapest where he plays the violin in a shabby restaurant; to New York where he lives three years, serving as a dock laborer; then to London where the principles of anarchy fostered and developed in him by the circumstances of his life find expression in the deed of violence that brings death to himself, leaving his victims to escape.

GIBBON, PERCEVAL. Adventures of Miss Gregory. $1.35 (2c) Putnam 13-7340

The heroine of these stories is a middle-aged Englishwoman who travels alone about the earth. Her travels take her down the west coast of Africa and into many a little-known port. Her adventures are varied and unique, but in most of them she appears as the alleviator of distress. The titles of the stories are: The adventures of a Portuguese trader; The adventure in the hotel at Beira; A season of miracles; The adventure with the slave dealer; Hamid; A dog—and unclean; Eva; The governor of the gaol; The elopement; The adventures; The honest man; Achievement.

+ A L A Bkl 9:454 Je '13

"We could have spared the emphasis so constantly laid on her blue blood and consequent commanding manners, but her doings and personality are of the material of which good fiction is made. The choice of so unconventional a type as the pivot of his book is much to

We have only to add one minor criticism. GIBBS, PHILIP, and GRANT, BERNARD. Balkan war: adventures of war with cross and crescent. il $1.20 (1½c) Small A13-564

The book contains two narratives, one that of Mr. Gibbs who was with the Bulgarian army; the other that of Mr. Grant who followed the defeated Turks. Neither of these two correspondents saw actual fighting, as the rigid censorship of the press practiced by both sides in the combat kept them from the front. Yet their narrative may be all the more interesting because of that fact; for what they describe is "the human side of war." Mr. Gibbs tells a story of preparation for war, of personal sacrifice, and of heroic endurance of hardship; Mr. Grant describes the other side—the retreat of a beaten army after a disastrous defeat.

"The book is packed with information on all phases of rural life. Whether it is sociology or not depends upon one's point of view and one's bringing up. It may be economics." (Survey) "Conceiving sociology as a study of the well-being of society, and the term 'rural' to include all interests not strictly urban in nature, [the author] covers a wide range of rural problems. These may thus relate to the purely technological aspects of farming and marketing, or to such social and institutional questions as would naturally arise in rural communities. A definite program for improvement is usually coupled with his analysis. Recognizing the inevitable trend of population toward the city as a phase of our industrial development, he conceives the real rural problem to be the improvement of the condition of those persons who remain on the farm." In this story of the girlhood and womanhood of Virginia Pendleton there is traced also the story of the development of the state for which she was named. Virginia was born near the end of the old régime that persisted for a decade or two after the war. She was bred in the old gentle southern traditions and when married to a man of brilliant promise, she tried to put into practice the old theory of self-immolation that the women of her family had followed for generations. But she was living in a new age that demanded new duties of women and she could not adapt herself to it. At the end one thing only remains to soften the bitterness of the defeat and failure of her life—the devotion of her son.

A story of a marriage of convenience between a girl of seventeen and a middle aged army officer. After thirteen years spent in India the two return to England. Here the wife meets the man who becomes the "lover" of the title.

"In her latest novel, Mrs. Glyn is not far different from the Mrs. Glyn who wrote "Three weeks." GOAD, HAROLD ELSDALE. The kingdom.
 *$1.25 (1½c) Stokes 13-8757

A deeply reflective novel dealing with the inner life of a young Franciscan friar of the convent at Assisi. The coming of an old friend who has won fame as an opera singer for a short visit at the convent reawakens in Father Bernardo's mind echoes of the old world, renounced by him seven years before. He lives over again the days of his youth when love for Vittoria the girl who had turned from him to marry Orlando, his friend, was the moving force in his life. He is led to review the motives which, after his loss of her, influenced him to adopt the religious life and in so doing finds himself examining the whole fabric of his faith. It is in attempting to help these two, Vittoria and Orlando, who have now drifted apart that his faith is returned to him in full measure.

"The writer knows well his subject, for he presents a vivid record of the life of a quite unusual man. Especially beautiful are the many pages devoted to rural Italy."

+ Boston Transcript p18 Jl 16 '13 180w

"The story is told with attractive sympathy, and the analytical work is at times admirably done. But the character of Bernardo, his progress and his triumph, are unreal and inconsistent. Though a story of a monk, and done, as we have said, with evident good intent, it is not at all Catholic. It seems to us like a grafting of amateurish mysticism upon modern pragmatism."

professional spirit, from the viewpoint of experts, which is free from national bias. Field Marshall Von Der Goltz, one of the foremost of Prussian tacticians and strategists, has continued the narrative from Jena up to Eylau. He is a stout Prussian and a vigorous controversialist, but nevertheless, considering Napoleon purely as a commander, he appreciates him and his appreciation is cordial. . . . He is animated by two purposes. The first is to show that the Prussian military character was much higher in 1806 than it is commonly thought to have been. . . . The second purpose is to warn Germany against accepting the tenets of anti-militarism."—Boston Transcript

The first of these deals with Common and inclosure in general, describing in detail the various rights of common, such as pasture, shack, estover, turbary, piscary, fowling, etc. . . . Book 2 traces the progress of inclosures by periods and by geographical divisions, from the time when sheep began to figure as the 'destroyers of farms and the devourers of men' down to the modern inclosures more systematically brought about and more generally recognized as promoting economic welfare. . . . Book 3 deals with the effect of inclosures from various points of view, namely, that of agriculture in general—methods of farming, amount and variety of crops and animals produced and their improvement in quality; social and economic effects upon country life as such; and lastly, the effect upon employment and population of the country as a whole."—J Pol Econ

GOODYEAR, WILLIAM HENRY. Greek refinements: studies in temperamental architecture. il $*10 Yale univ. press 12-25762

"The word refinements has come to acquire a special technical meaning when applied in architectural writing. It signifies the intentional variations from formal regularity and symmetry. . . . Mr. Goodyear, 'curator of fine arts at the Brooklyn institute museum, is the first to discuss thoroughly and systematically a subject whose importance was not appreciated either by John Pennethorne, who in 1837 was the first to discover the horizontal curvatures of the Parthenon, or by other students of ancient architecture." (Boston Transcript) "The most novel result of the author's larger survey is to show that delicate curves and deviations from vertical lines inward, or even outward, were a common feature in all the older temples, so far as their ruins still admit of accurate measurements, and that these aberrations are even more marked in the older temples than in the Parthenon, which is the acme of Greek building." "This handsome book is written by an experienced specialist, already well known for his works on artistic architecture, but, with all his knowledge, he has not yet learnt how to put together his materials. GOOKIN, FREDERICK WILLIAM. Japanese colour-prints and their designers. il $10 Japan soc., 165 Broadway, N. Y. 13-10857

"To commemorate its loan exhibition of fine color-prints in May, 1911, the Japan society of New York has published a carefully illustrated catalogue, prefaced by the lecture delivered by Frederick William Gookin at the opening of the exhibition. The volume is a thin folio in

"A volume that will find a place beside the finest of its predecessors. The value of the reproductions, in accurate color, of twenty-five of the supreme masterpieces of color-print design, is not small; nor is the service to the public in reproducing them a superfluous one. But on the other hand, one could wish that the author had faced a little more squarely the difficult, perhaps impossible, task of defining in words those elements of beauty in the prints which, though they make so sharp an appeal to the eye of the expert, are not all so obvious to the layman." GORDON, ANNA ADAMS. Life of Frances E. Willard; with introd. by Lady Henry Somerset. il $1.50 (2½c) W. C. T. U. 12-22139

An appreciation by Lady Henry Somerset, speeches by Miss Willard and extracts from her journals, eulogies at the time of her death, are all included in this volume which tells the story of her life and work. This biography is revised and abridged from the memorial volume which was published in 1898. The transient character of much of the material used in that volume and the demand for a smaller book have led to the preparation of the present work.

"The essential facts of the larger volume have been judiciously selected, and tact and discrimination have been shown in the use of materials gleaned through a long and intimate friendship. The omission of a mass of transient matter, specially most of the character sketches and tributes, the convenient size and broader margins, improved press work, good paper and neat binding have resulted in a very satisfactory edition."

GORDON, GEORGE STUART, comp. English literature and the classics. *$2 Oxford 13-16315

A group of nine essays delivered originally as lectures at Oxford. "Four of the lectures deal with Greek influence and five with Latin. . . . Their duty is to discuss the larger relations of literature, to consider the sources in relation to English literature rather than the more customary way of regarding English literature in relation to its sources. Because of these two characters the series of lectures accomplishes the result of emphasizing not merely the relation of the classics to early English literature but also their effect on modern literature." GOURMONT, RÉMY DE. Night in the Luxembourg; tr., with a preface by Arthur Ransome. $1.50 (5½c) Luce, J. W.
(Eng ed 13-888)

A work by a French mystic and symbolist now for the first time translated into English. The story which purports to be a copy of a manuscript left by a young journalist who is found dead in his rooms, tells how on a winter's night in an empty church in the Luxembourg he "is confronted with a reincarnation of Christ or Apollo. He is conducted into an enchanted garden, there to partake of a Virgilian breakfast with the three goddesses who appear before him. . . . The main interest of the book lies in the dictates and reflections of the stranger. Upon evolution, humanity, progress; upon utilitarian and ascetic morality; and the whole fabric of civilization, as the majority have made it and as the minority would wish it, he turns the rays of a blank nihilism." (Ath)

"It would require no penetrating sagacity to undermine this neat little paper edifice of thought. We prefer to regard it as what it is—an extravaganza, an audacious excursus of fancy pieced together with the fertile skill of a consummate artist. We feel, indeed, that this style has been forced somewhat harshly into a 'mariage de convenance' with matter that is flimsy, academic, and mannered. Mr. Arthur Ransome's translation is one of the best things he has done. In the truest sense he has captured the quintessential spirit of the book with rare felicity and sensitiveness of expression."

In this book the author presents a sketch of the pre-Manchu period of Chinese history. A knowledge of that past history, he holds, is necessary for an understanding of present Chinese problems. Furthermore this early history has been neglected. "Chinese history has almost invariably been treated from the point of view of foreign relations, with the result that a few pages have sufficed for the four millenniums prior to the Manchu occupation. . . . To the best of the writer's knowledge there is no work in English giving the student such a sketch of pre-Manchu times as will enable him to grasp the singular continuity of Chinese political and social life." GRAHAM, STEPHEN. Tramp's sketches. $1.60 Macmillan A13-313

"The sketches which form this book were written chiefly while tramping the shores of the Black sea and the road to Jerusalem. . . . The journey which he made took him along over the battlefields of the Crimea, along the Black sea shores a thousand miles to Batum, to Jerusalem with 7000 peasant pilgrims whose life he lived in the hospitable Greek monasteries, and in the great Russian hostelry in the Holy City, with whom he bathed in the Jordan, where all were dressed in their death shrouds, and with whom he spent a night in the sepulcher. . . . Though the descriptions are vivid to the point that one can feel the wind in the face, the mist on the cheek, or the warm straw into which the traveler crawls besides hospitable peasants on a night of storms, it is the spiritual significance of it all that rises increasingly superior to facts and circumstances however picturesque."—Springfield Republican.

+ A L A Bkl 9:323 Ap '13

"We cannot say that the outcome, expressed in the philosophizing on life which fills his later pages, is startling either in its novelty or its profundity; but the colour and life which find expression during his journeyings along the Caucasian and Crimean shores of the Black sea, are notable enough to justify this collection of his work in book-form."

The authors of this handsome and well illustrated volume claim to have "described no place which they did not visit, and no custom which they did not themselves observe during a protracted sojourn in north Africa." The work is divided into two parts. "In the first part the historical element preponderates. The authors manage to give a fairly comprehensive account of the history in antiquity based on the archaeological discoveries. It is broken up somewhat owing to its being divided according to the sites visited. The later history down to the suppression of the Barbary pirates is also told fragmentarily. . . . The second part is devoted to impressions of travel." (N Y Sun)

GRATACAP, LOUIS POPE. Popular guide to minerals. il *$3 Van Nostrand 12-19366

An enlarged and revised edition of "Vade mecum of minerals" published in 1903. The text "is intended chiefly for the use of visitors to public cabinets and collections of minerals, but is so arranged that it forms an adequate text for elementary teaching in mineralogy as well." (Dial) "The book contains a section on crystallography, followed by a discussion of the physical and chemical properties of minerals. The section devoted to the description of mineral species—in harmony with the purpose of the book—has been entitled, 'Guide to collections.' An extensive history of the development of mineralogy follows and the book closes with a description of the fine Bement mineral collection which belongs to the American museum of natural history in New York city and of which the author of the book is curator." (Science) There are 400 text illustrations, 74 photograph plates and a map showing the distribution of minerals in the United States.

GRAVES, CLOTILDE INEZ MARY (RICHARD DEHAN, pseud.). Maids in a market garden. il $1 (2c) Wycl

An early story by a writer whose later, more serious work has been done under the pseudonym, Richard Dehan. The story, which is farcical, relates the merry adventures of a half dozen unmarried English gentlewomen who band together as market gardeners. The venture is carried out on a small farm in Cornwall and the quaintness of a number of local characters adds to the comedy. Altho an Adamless paradise is the ideal set up in the beginning the inevitable happens before the end, and in four cases out of the six there is the conventional happy ending.

"This book comprises four sections, treating of (1) direct-current machinery, (2) alternators and synchronous motors, (3) polyphase inductions motors, and (4) transformers. In general, the order of treatment of each section is as follows: (1) Theory of operation, (2) armature winding, (3) mechanical construction, (4) insulation, (5) armature reaction (leakage reactance in the case of induction motors and of transformers), (6) design of field system, (7) losses, efficiency, and heating, (8) procedure in design, (9) special problems, and (10) specifications. . . . While not fundamentally theoretical in character, sufficient theory is given to introduce properly each subject and to give the reader the author's viewpoint. A considerable amount of data in the form of concrete examples adds much to the usefulness of the book."—Engin Rec

"Mr. Gray's book is a work of high order. A soundness of judgment and a sane and simple treatment are characteristic of the author's methods and, while the book is primarily written for students, it is really a compendium of experience enlightened by scientific method. A story described as "a romance of the Italian lakes," altho for many pages the reader is absorbed in the affairs of a London bank clerk and his family, and there is no word of Italy throuth the whole of book one. With book two, however, the scene shifts to the south and there is an unexpected revelation of a past romance in the life of Ronald Leith, undreamed of by his placid English wife. There is a remeeting in Italy with the love of his youth, a righting of old wrongs, and a consequent happy readjustment in the lives of the two young lovers, who are son and daughter of the lovers of old.

A second edition of the first volume was issued in 1909, and the work is now completed by the publication of the third volume. The correspondence has been carefully edited, and the copious annotations, which are due to the zeal and industry of Mr. Tovey, render this the definitive edition of one of the most delightful letter-writers of the eighteenth century."—Ath (Dial) "The book is largely composed out of Walpole's own voluminous correspondence, but some of the best and freshest illustrative matter is taken from the publications of the Historical mss. commission. The one-act plays that make up the contents of this volume are: The bogie men; The full moon; Coats; Damer's gold; McDonough's wife. The first of these was given its initial production in London in July 1912; the others have all been produced at the Abbey theatre, Dublin. Lady Gregory adds several pages of notes, commenting on the origin of the plays and on other matters concerning them.

GRETTON, RICHARD HENRY. Modern history of the English people, 1889-1910. 2v $*5 (2c) Small (13-1437)

The period covered in the first volume was a period of rapid change from an old order to a new. Of these changes, the author says, they affected "every activity of the nation, corporate and individual. They concerned political ideas, social habits and commercial methods, religious outlook and material equipment, education and the housekeeper's supplies, keeping of holidays and furnishing of houses, philosophical speculation and the pursuits of a clerk's Saturday afternoons." (Preface) For his dates and facts the author has drawn largely on the files of the Times, and he acknowledges an indebtedness to Punch for information as to the popular interests of the period. In the second volume the "Boer war and the Fiscal controversy take up most of the first half of the book, while its last pages are occupied by the constitutional crisis which cannot yet be considered at an end. As in the first volume, however, Mr. Gretton is not exclusively concerned with high politics. He lays great emphasis upon his descriptions of the social side of life, and their success is undeniable." (Spec)

GRIMMELSHAUSEN, HANS JAKOB CHRIST-
12 OFFEL von. Adventurous Simplicissimus.
*$2.50 Dutton

A 17th century work translated into English for the first time. "Simplicissimus lived during that bitter chapter in Germany's history, the Thirty years' war. Driven from his peasant home by the marauding soldiers, he finds an abiding place while still a little boy with an earnest old hermit. He grows up in the forest with the lack of worldly experience, which gained for him the name of Simplicius Simplicissimus when at a later day he tumbles into Ramsay's court at Hamsau, where he becomes a sort of court fool and flounders about through many burlesque blunders. Under cover of the simplicity of his hero, Grimmelshausen satirizes the follies of his day." (N Y Times)

"The translator, in his Introduction, speaks of it as chiefly valuable from the historical and sociological aspects; and this is so far true, for the novel, which has the 'Thirty years' war' for its background, affords a priceless commentary on the manners of the period. But it is also a fine piece of literature, though frequently tedious and extravagant."

The young Irishman, Scott, has had a bitter struggle with poverty, and is betrothed to a girl equally poor. To make their marriage possible, he resolved to seek the treasure thus wonderfully thrown in his way. He goes to New Guinea, associates with himself two miners of pluck and experience; has his steps dogged from the first by a human reptile of the basest sort—and so the story begins." GROOT, JAN JAKOB MARIA DE. Religion in China. (American lectures on the history of religions) *$1.50 (3c) Putnam 12-25097

The author presents the lectures contained in this book as a key to the study of Taoism and Confucianism. There are in China three religions, Taoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism; yet there is a saying in that country to the effect that the three are one. The author interprets this saying by explaining that "the three religions are three branches, growing from a common stem, which has existed from pre-historic times; this stem is the religion of the universe, its parts and phenomena. . . . As these three religions are its three integral parts, every Chinese can feel himself equally at home in each." The eight chapters, which were originally delivered as the "American lectures on the history of religion," are: The Tao or order of the universe; The Tao of man; Perfection, holiness, or divinity;

Asceticism; Worship of the universe; Social and political universalism (2 chapters); Fung-shui.

"A book of great importance, being the work of a scholar who has spent half a lifetime on his subject. Many will rejoice to have the range of the author's views in such convenient form. The methodical manner in which they are presented and his support of statements of fact by translations from Chinese originals put readers in a position to weigh his theories and to draw their own conclusions. "The description of so many palaces and churches in so short a space reduces it almost to a catalogue, and, were it not for the excellent illustrations of places, types, and characteristic scenes, the reader would hardly gain a very vivid notion of the town. An amusing account of restaurants and summer life in the resorts near town shows the author to be a humorous observer of externals, though we cannot but regret the rather sweeping generalizations in which he indulges."

The author says: "It has been my chief aim to show that a proper understanding of and sympathy with the various stages through which the child normally passes will do much toward making not only the child happier, but the task of the parents pleasanter." The problems taken up in her chapters are: The problem of punishment; When your child imagines things; The lies children tell; Being afraid; The first great law; The training of the will; How children reason; Work and play; Children's gangs, clubs, and friendships; Children's ideals and ambitions; The stork or the truth; The golden age of transition; Heredity and environment.

GUBELMANN, ALBERT EDWARD. Studies

¹⁰ in the lyric poems of Friedrich Hebbel. $2.25 (2½c) Yale univ. press 13-937

The author makes in this volume a study of the sensuous in Hebbel's lyric poetry. Of his method the author says it "purposely departs from the historical-critical procedure."

. . . We have practically ignored the historical factor, which is always involved in the conception and production of art works. We have paid little heed to the matter of literary analogies, to the influence of tradition, of intellectual associations, of universal philosophic or æsthetic theories. We have confined ourselves consistently to the essential phenomenon under discussion." (Foreword)
 There are six chapters taking up, after an introduction, Hebbel's æsthetic theory; Colors; Sounds; Silence and solitude; The tactual sense.

"We cannot think that the results will help much to an understanding or appreciation of Hebbel as a poet: the minute statistical method which has become familiar nowadays in works of this kind seems to us to have been carried here to an unprofitable extreme."

As Mr. Thorne tells the life-story of this remarkable man we not only get the picture of a brave, fearless, Christian soul fighting evil in his attacks on the disreputable music halls, the building of huge and influential social and religious centres as the Assembly Hall, but also close and intimate relations of that sordid, starved, criminal, suffering East end of London of which our knowledge has been sufficiently acquired in the pages of fiction or the lifeless tables of social statistics."—Boston Transcript

GUTH, WILLIAM WESTLEY. Revelation and its record. *$1.25 (2½c) Sherman, French & co. 12-16444

The author believes that "all truth is revelation and that all revelation is natural." There is no distinction to be drawn between natural and revealed truth. He endeavors in this book "to show first, the necessity of revelation because of the nature both of God and man; second, the conditions under which it must be received; and last, its record in various living and imperishable forms." (Preface) The record of revelation in nature, in human life, in history, in music and the fine arts, in literature and in holy writ, are the subjects of his discussion.

"A wholesome book, well calculated to lead people without any sense of discontinuity from the narrower to the broader conception of revelation. "In his 'Poems and ballads' Hermann Hagedorn strikes a true note in a wide variety of song. From the opening poem, 'The infidel,' where the old theme, become so common to-day, between a faith dead and a faith alive, is treated in the light of a master passion, down to the sharp rebuke of 'The senate's repudiation of an honorable compact,' is a wide stretch for the imagination. Between 'Laneer' and 'The cobbler of Glamorgan' is an equally wide march of dramatic action. . . . 'Monna vita' carries the French lightness of touch to the treatment of woman as she is treated in America—of woman as she is found in America—a bit of the coquette and a bit of the 'perfect woman nobly planned.'—Ind

I believe that this is due to the fact that Mr. Hagedorn has not yet attained a personal style of expression rather than to any indefiniteness of intent. A story of life at its most sordid depths, in the heart of a London slum. It deals too with the most hopeless of themes, mental degeneracy. The white thread, to quote the famous specialist of the story, is that strain of lunacy that runs thru certain families and that can be traced as "you trace the wavering white thread in a block of mushroom spawn"; yet the reader who has finished the book would prefer to think that it might apply to the strain of goodness and purity that runs thru the same race and that cannot be wholly destroyed or blotted out. It comes to fine flower here in Tilly the little maid-of-all-work; for in spite of the sordidness of its setting and theme this is a story of great sweetness and beauty.

HALL, GERTRUDE. Truth about Camilla. il $1.30 (1c) Century

The author makes no apologies for the frank adventuress who is her heroine; and the attitude of the reader toward this ingenious young woman is apt to be that of Mrs. Northmere, the American woman who for years acted as her patron. One does not approve of Camilla, does not love her; but does find her an intensely interesting study and cannot withhold from her a certain measure of admiration. Camilla, who makes up fantastic stories of her birth and parentage, is, altho she never knows it, the daughter of an Italian nobleman. Her father provides for her education, then lets her drift. She is successively a teacher of languages in a pension, the companion of an elderly woman novelist, the wife of an opera singer, proprietor of a lace shop, and finally, as the Marchesa Filiberti, a grand lady in her own right.

Ath 1913,2:381 O 11 160w

"We rather like Camilla, and are glad to know of good fortune that comes to her at the last. We like the pictures of Italian life of various kinds, which ring true. HALL, HAROLD FIELDING PATRICK. World soul. *$2.75 (4½c) Holt A13-1733

"All that the author traverses in the first part of his book is familiar ground to many thinkers, and he claims to have added nothing new to the problems of human destiny. Yet it was all a preparation for a most startling exposition of the character and teachings of the supreme thinker of the world, Jesus. . . . Both the teachings and the character of Jesus are divorced, in these pages, from that of the church that has been founded in his name. Mr. Fielding-Hall eschews all miracles. He makes Jesus a very human figure, but his wisdom divine. He accepts literally that the Kingdom of Heaven is within you. One must not suppose that the author is not reverent in his discussion of these interpretations of New Testament history. HALL, HARRY REGINALD HOLLAND. Ancient history of the near East. 11 *$5 Macmillan (Eng ed 13-10921)

By the near East Mr. Hall means the various countries lying along the northern and southern shores of the Mediterranean sea—Greece, Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, etc. Their history is systematically traced for us in this volume from earliest times to the year 479 B. C., when Salamis and Plataea forever put an end to the Persian dream of European conquest and firmly established Greece as a world power." (N Y Times) The work "is intended mainly for the use of students in the school of Literae Humaniores at Oxford, and as a companion to Herodotus for university students generally." (Ath)

"Mr. Hall not infrequently gives on one page what appears to be his own judgment on some disputed point, and a few pages later casts doubt on the judgment before confidently expressed. This tendency will puzzle the university student who is to take the book as his guide. We are far, indeed, from saying that with stringent revision and correction it might not be made into a valuable work for all purposes."

As we read these pages we realize more distinctly that the nineteenth century changes were above all changes of thought and of policy. It was marked by great conflicts, but as we look back over the century, it is not the conditions brought about by Waterloo and the Franco-Prussian war that astounds us. Other centuries have known terrible wars. The nineteenth century shows marvelous changes in the direction of democracy."—Boston Transcript

A story of the love of one man for two women. A London barrister who made his way in spite of an honesty and morality, that are deemed Quixotic by his friends, marries a beautiful woman whose social ambitions outweigh her love. Her refusal of the duty of maternity and her love for another man drive the husband to the point of suicide. He is saved by his secretary who takes away the revolver and reveals to him her love and her willingness to satisfy his yearning for an ideal home, though it cannot be a legal home. He accepts her offer and in time, as he grows to love her, the wife realizes that she has let slip the most precious thing in her life. The book is realistically frank in its sex discussions and is written from the purely masculine viewpoint.

Ballymoy, in the west of Ireland, had an American visitor who regretted the slumbering character of the town. But when he asked to see the birthplace of General John Regan he woke up more activity than the place had ever known before. At once he was shown ancestral home and relatives of his hero and was told of a memorial soon to be erected and to be unveiled by the Lord Lieutenant. True, none of the citizens had ever heard of the General but their ignorance was silenced by the tactful and genial Dr. O'Grady, akin in type to the well-known "J. J." It is then the imaginative doctor's task to find a statue and arrange a proper celebration, yet at no expense to the Ballymoy citizens. A romance differentiated in tone from the usual rollicking tale of Irish life with which Mr. Hannay's name is associated. It is a story of Ireland between the years 1798 and 1800, the period of the rise and defeat of the "United Irishman." Micah Ward, a Presbyterian minister, his son Neal, and his brother Donald, who has fought for liberty in America, are three leaders in the rebellion. Lord Dunsevir, whose son and daughter have been Neal's childhood friends, is in command of the troops that crush it. The story ends with the failure of the uprising, with Neal and Una starting out to begin a new life in America.

"The account of the means whereby the escape of Neal Ward is effected under the face and eyes of the commander of the troops sent to arrest him gives the one significant touch of Birminghamian humor to the story. For the rest it is very serious, very matter-of-fact, very close to history, and at the same time very entertaining." E. F. E.

HANNAY, JAMES OWEN (GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM, pseud.). Red hand of Ulster. *$1.20 Doran 12-22594

"It is a sort of prophetic political novel based upon the present Irish ferment over home rule, and it deals not merely with the present, but with the rebellion and violence that numerous hot-headed Ulsterians are vociferously prophesying and threatening. The plot involves an American millionaire who for the mere sake of a new sensation and the excitement finances practical opposition to home rule, but the outcome is of course nothing more than a fizzle when the rebels come into open conflict with the authorities of Belfast."—Boston Transcript.

"An absolutely irresistible political novel, the comedy of which is so impartial that it may be relished by Home Rulers and Unionists alike. Never has his character-drawing been more brilliant, nor his ironic sobriety of style more effective."

"It is possibly the alien political atmosphere that weakens the humor of the story, but whatever the cause it is certainly something of a disappointment to those who have looked upon Mr. Birmingham's high spirits as inexhaustible. HARBEN, WILLIAM NATHANIEL. Desired woman. 11 *$1.30 (1c) Harper 13-18722

Like Mr. Harben's other stories this is a romance of Georgia. Richard Mostyn, an Atlanta banker, spends a vacation in the mountains, and at the end of it, goes back to the city engaged to the young country school teacher, a beautiful girl, doing a noble work among her people. Once back in his old habitat, however, he allows himself to forget her, and makes a merely mercenary marriage. The girl, altho she thought she had given him all her heart, is of too fine a type to be overcome. She devotes herself to her work, and in time finds a better love, but for the man, there is life-long retribution, of which business unsuccess and the failure of his marriage are a part.

"A sentimentalist at bottom, like so many rhetoricians of his stripe, he has a warm heart for the Vienna burgomaster, Karl Lueger, whom he absurdly overrates, while he is rather puzzled by the popularity of the unemotional King Edward. The articles on Czar Nicholas II, Francis Joseph, and Albert of Saxony are commonplace, with all their superficial learning and occasional pungency, while the imaginary deliverances of Tolstoy and Rockefeller are the worst example of Harden's inflated bombast. In the article on Briand, as he often does, he runs analogies into the ground. The most interesting of the essays is the one on Leo XIII, where the subject lends himself to the treatment—the inklings of mysterious occurrences and suggestions of profound state secrets by which Harden holds his German audiences. "This book is something more than a revision of the author's 'Essentials in mediæval and modern history.' As the task of revision progressed, its scope was so enlarged that, by reorganization, extension, and rewriting, the result became practically a new work. It has been deemed best, therefore, to give to the book a distinctive name, and at the same time to continue the publication of the old volume. In general, the aim in this book has been to decrease the amount of space devoted to political and military details, and to increase the emphasis on social, industrial, and cultural topics. Full treatment also is given to the important events which have occurred since the 'Essentials in mediæval and modern history' was first published."—Preface

"But for one story we should be obliged to say that this volume was unworthy of the author of 'Elder Conkling.' 'An English saint' is a masterly portrait of an empty-headed, ascetically and aesthetically inclined churchman, in the hands of a clever and determined woman of the world, who marries and canonizes him. 'The miracle of the stigmata' is the exploitation of a vein which has already been worked for all it is worth by Anatole France and Maurice Maeterlinck. It is well done by Mr. Harris; but it has been better done by the Frenchman and the Dutchman. 'The irony of chance' has neither dramatic interest nor literary distinction, and the amount of pseudo-science is distressing. The other stories are trivial, and cannot add to the reputation of Mr. Frank Harris; in the judgment of some they will damage it."

HARRIS, FRANK. Women of Shakespeare. $2 (3½c) Kennerley (Eng ed W12-30)

The book is a companion volume to the author's "The man Shakespeare," supplementing that volume in that it probes more deeply into Shakespeare's inner life. Following out his favorite device of reading the man thru his works the author here presents his version of Shakespeare the lover, obtained thru a study of the women of his plays. Shakespeare's wife, mother, mistress and daughter are the four women who serve as prototypes for the women characters of the dramas. His wife appears first as Adriana in "The comedy of errors." His mother is pictured in the mother of Coriolanus. Mary Fitton, the mistress, served as a model for Juliet, Portia, Rosalind, Helena and Cleopatra; while Judith Shakespeare, the daughter, is pictured in the gentle heroines of the later plays, Marina, Perdita and Miranda.

"If Mr. Harris were not so serious and so evidently convinced by his own reasoning, we should be disposed to think it all a deliberate hoax, perpetrated possibly with the object of showing the Baconians how, with persistence enough, one can read anything he pleases into the text of Shakespeare." A. G. Newcomer.

— Dial 54:237 Mr 16 '13 1150w

"Mr. Harris's reasoning is too uninstructed to deserve to be recounted in detail. It is a good illustration of how smartness, when it attempts to unmask genius, is itself stripped bare."

"Mr. Harris's psychology is as bad as his history. While one finds the main contention of this book altogether fantastic and baseless, unsupported by internal evidence and much of it disproved by external evidence, the book is partly worth reading. The writer does really know his Shakespeare, and his sensibility to the poetry enables him often to make illuminating remarks upon the verses he cites."

— + N Y Sun p12 Ja 11 '13 4500w

"The central value of Mr. Harris' work for Shakespeare lies in his deep and discriminating delight as a reader. His judgment of what is truly Shakespeare's strikes us as never at fault. Whether his Fitton faith be historically sound or no is a matter of small moment compared with the incidental value of this inherent quality in all his writing about Shakespeare. If somebody were to prove to-morrow by historic evidence that Mary Fitton is a figment, this book and 'The man Shakespeare' would remain great contributions to our knowledge of the man Shakespeare, shedding light upon sides of his genius that have never before been rightly appreciated, and communicating to our palates the very gusto of his authentic voice."

A story of Canada, and of a young Englishman who came out to the Dominion to meet the bride to whom he had been betrothed since childhood. But the girl is capricious; she has no desire to meet—much less to wed—a man whom she cannot respect; and the men she respects are the men who have done things. Altho she persistently refuses to see Trevelyan, she manages all the time to keep an eye on his progress and development. For under the stimulus of the new environment the Englishman awakens to the possibilities of his own manhood and he does develop until he meets even Patricia Sutherland's exacting ideals.

HARRISON, FREDERIC. Among my books: centenaries, reviews, memoirs. $1.75 Macmillan 13-35072

Frederic Harrison's new book of essays "takes its name from those chapters wherein, with his own library for text, he gossips happily on the art and the makers of literature. 'Gossip' is hardly the word, unless it be modified by the adjective 'Olympian.'" (Outlook) "An old man has the right he says, to sit down and read his books. He sits down for us and pulls out his books and muses over them. There is an indefinable charm to us in these books that have been friends for sixty years. A second part of the book takes up, one century at a time, the period from 800 B. C. to 800 A. D. . . . In part 3 the formula for each chapter begins with the Holy Roman empire and expands over the nations of western Europe as they become active in history, while passing attention is given to the eastern nations with whom they come in contact. HARTOG, MARCUS MANUEL. Problems of life and reproduction. il *$2.50 Putnam A13-1123

"The collection of essays is made up of papers selected from the author's contributions to British scientific periodicals during a period of about twenty years. Among the topics discussed are: 'The cellular pedigree and the problem of heredity'; 'The rotation of the blood formation to ordinary cell-division'; 'The "New force" mitokinetism'; 'Nuclear reduction and the function of chromatin'; 'Fertilization'; and 'The transmission of acquired characters.' The essays, as a rule, are distinctly controversial, most of them having been written in defense of scientific opinions held by the author, and in attacks upon the opinions of other people."—N Y Times

"We are glad to see these essays take a place in the 'Progressive science series.' Though polemical in character, they are well and tersely written, and deserve a better fate than interment in the back numbers of periodicals. We must also congratulate the author upon the excellence of the index; it is one of the fullest and best it has been our good fortune to meet with in recent scientific literature."

"It is by no means easy to make out why there should be a place in the 'Science series' for this work. It has no unity—a mere collection of essays and addresses, eleven in number, all but one of which has already been printed, some of them ten and twenty years ago. To be sure, they have been rewritten, and their facts brought up to the present day. But the point of view remains unmodern; and the pages deal with fights fought long ago and matters that now lie well out on the margin of scientific interest. Nevertheless, the book, little as it seems worth while as a whole, has much to commend it in its separate parts." H: C. Shelley.

HAUPTMANN, GERHART JOHANN ROBERT.
Dramatic works; ed. by Ludwig Lewisohn.
v 1 and 2 ea. $1.50 Huebsch 13-36061

v. 1. This is the initial issue in a series that is planned to comprise a practically complete and authorized edition of Hauptmann's dramatic works in English translation. The four plays in this volume are: "Before dawn," "The weavers," "The beaver coat," and "The conflagration." The translation of "The weavers" is by Mary Morison, that of the other three by Prof. Lewisohn. His "introduction, evidently intended to serve for the whole series of plays rather than the first volume only, is in the main an informing sketch of Hauptmann's career and a discerning comment upon his art." (Springfield Republican)

v. 2. The three plays contained in this second volume are Drayman Henschel, Rose Bernd, and The rats. The editor, who translates the plays, furnishes also a brief introduction.

"Professor Lewisohn's faithful and sympathetic English translations of Gerhart Hauptmann's plays show a true appreciation of the fine poetic quality in the work of Germany's greatest present-day dramatist, as well as a rare knowledge of the subtleties of the German language and of its perplexing dialects. He helps us understand the large humanity which is Hauptmann's basic creed, and he guides us unerringly through occasional mazes of symbolism. Neither 'The beaver coat' nor 'The conflagration' are good stage plays. As reading dramas they are unique,—principally so through their portrayal of the hypocritical, thieving, and cleverly unscrupulous Mrs. Wolff-Fleitz. If we look upon Gerhart Hauptmann as a world poet, one whose magic art reflects the changing currents of thought in his own country,—a country whose literary standards are helping to formulate ideals the world over,—this new English edition of his dramas ought to hold a promise for closer spiritual communion in the future, through this interpretation of some of the greatest works in modern literature." A. K. Boguslawsky.

It was Renan who said that the Gospel of Luke was the most beautiful book ever written. "Dr. Hayes says if the Gospel of Luke is the most beautiful book ever written then it is probable that it is the product of a beautiful soul. So he divides his work into two parts. Part one is an attempt to discover the beautiful soul of Luke, the beloved physician. The second part is an attempt to tell in popular language the peculiar characteristics of the Gospel." "The material for the chapters on the negro as a wage-earner is derived from the national census of 1900 and the state census of 1905. The investigation of the negro in business was done by Dr. Haynes personally and is minute in its details. The writer finds the negro wage-earner in New York moving slowly away from domestic service into other positions. . . . Second, the reader delighted with Mr. Headlam's recently published Provence will find here little of the atmosphere which distinguished that book. But the present volume is an excellent compendium of history. It is to be commended especially to those who would gain a quick survey. Its compactness is admirable."

+ Outlook 103:864 Ap 19 '13 80w

"To write an adequate history of France from the Stone age to the Battle of Sedan in four hundred pages of large print is clearly beyond the power of man; but Mr. Headlam might have made a much worse failure than he has. Mr. Headlam does not fall into the errors of modern French teaching and lead his readers to suppose that French history began in 1789—in fact, barely a sixth of his work is devoted to the events which succeeded the opening of the revolution. It looks suspiciously as if he found his matter was exceeding its limits, and severe compression had to be employed. The treatment becomes, therefore, less adequate as the story runs on. We have, however, noted a few serious errors, and the book may quite well serve a useful purpose."

HEALY, TIMOTHY MICHAEL. Stolen waters:
a page in the conquest of Ulster. *$3.25
Longmans A13-2317

A recent decision in the House of Lords relating to the public right to fish in Lough Neagh in the north of Ireland led the author to make this investigation of ancient records.
"The investigation takes us back to the beginning of the seventeenth century, when James I induced certain Londoners to engage in the planting of Ulster in return for fishing rights in Lough Foyle and in the river Bann. Mr.
Healy reveals . . . the methods, clever and tortuous and fraudulent, by which Sir Arthur Chichester, Lord Deputy of Ireland, appropriated to himself the river Bann, Lough Neagh, and much other valuable property upon which he founded the fortunes of the family whose descendants are still living, and who now gain an additional advantage by the decision of England's high court of justice. The book . . . illuminates the manner in which the English aristocracy has 'governed' Ireland."
(Nation)

"Those who have the patience to keep up with his argument, will come to the conclusion that Mr. Healy is fighting against a great injustice, and will get many new lights on the Tudor and Stuart period of Irish history." R.
E. Thompson.

HEAPE, WALTER. Sex antagonism. *$1.50
Putnam (Eng ed 13-20760)

"The essay is essentially a critical examination of Dr. Frazer's theories in regard to exogamy and totemism from the biological rather than the anthropological standpoint from which they are usually judged. The broad result reached by Dr. Heape is that exogamy is antecedent to, and of separate origin from, totemism. It is a part of the original sexual law of the male, and is therefore a product of the masculine mind. Totemism, on the other hand, which has the theory of conception as its tap-root, is feminine in origin. . . . Biology shows that, throughout the animal kingdom, the sexuality of the male and that of the female are, and apparently always have been, on different planes."—Ath

Ath 1913,1:590 My 31 40w

"A short and clever sketch. The chapter on 'Maternal impressions and birthmarks' is the least satisfactory part of the book, since it seems to be based chiefly on hearsay evidence devoid of any real scientific value. There is a meagre Index."

+ — Ath 1913,1:675 Je 21 400w

"The work must be profoundly interesting to every intelligent reader as expounding in clear and popular language principles which necessarily underlie the relations of the sexes and involve, both politically and socially, the phenomena of human existence."

+ Lit D 47:882 N 8 '13 150w

"There could be conceived no more fair-minded, more excellently noble specimen of controversial writing than that which constitutes the body of Mr. Heape's discussion. It is this presentation of one man's work and one man's mind against the mind and work of another, equally scholarly and of equal discernment, which is the meat of the volume. Yet we doubt much if Mr. Heape's impressive pessimism will daunt the quick-tongued feminists of either sex, and we have a lurking suspicion that the more serious-minded and thoughtful among them may put forward some very telling objections, not to Mr. Heape's treatment of the biological aspect of the feminist movement, but to his refusal to treat it as anything other than biological."

+ — N Y Times 18:561 O 19 '13 1550w

"Biologists of sex and students of anthropology, at first attracted by Mr. Heape's eminent acquaintance with biological methods, and by his well-fought duel with Dr. Frazer . . . may well be disappointed, even indignant. To write as if sex-antagonisms could be settled thus simply, with women treated for practical purposes as cows and poultry, and we their freer mates, is an intolerable materialism."

At the beginning of the seventeenth century, the general outlines of the continents, with the exception of Austria and the parts washed by the North Pacific ocean, were fairly well determined. It remained for future explorers to fill in the details and to sweep the broad oceans to make sure no other great land masses were to be found. HERMANCE, WILLIAM ELLSWORTH. Unorthodox conception of being. *$2.50 (2c) Putnam

The author gives to his book the subtitle: A synthetic philosophy of ontology; and says of his specific object in writing it that he aimed "to give expression to his ideas regarding man's existence and environment. It is a conception of Being not exactly orthodox according to any of the general beliefs, therefore, he calls the conception Unorthodox." (Preface) "He takes something of each of the four historical conceptions of Being—materialism, idealism, dualism, and monism—and combines them into a new form not quite orthodox according to any of the accepted philosophies." (N Y Times)

"The book, marked by clarity of thought and a lucid, virile style, will be of particular interest to all who concern themselves with metaphysical speculation. But it is likely to gather still another and larger audience out of that great multitude of drifting and seeking souls who have suddenly found themselves without either spiritual belief or fragment of basis for such belief."

+ N Y Times 18:213 Ap 13 '13 280w

"There is the frantic effort of all compromisers to be consistent, and for fear he may have conceded too much to the idealists he limits desire by material conditions. The reader is likely to close the book with the awkward question, 'Are the idealistic and materialistic boats within hailing distance of each other.'"

HERMANN, E. Eucken and Bergson: their significance for Christian thought. *$1 Pilgrim press (Eng ed 12-29965)

"The chief concern of the book is to trace the main elements of modern intellectual activity concerned with philosophical and religious interests; to show what shape they take in the philosophies of Rudolf Eucken and Henri Bergson, and to discover how far these two men are molding modern thought and how far they are being influenced by its tendencies."—N Y Times

"A scholarly exposition."

+ A L A Bkl 9:240 F '13

"This is a worthy product of the latest movement in religious thought. In a vigorous style, which is free, like that of his masters, from technical jargon, Mrs. Hermann here sets forth the core of the teaching of Eucken and of Bergson. In the case of Eucken she has many and definite utterances concerning Christianity to go upon; in the case of Bergson we still await such, yet we cannot but think that Mrs. Hermann's view of what is already implied in Bergson's will be largely corroborated. Although she is apparently unable to subscribe to all the articles of the Christian creed, Mrs. Hermann's presentation of Christianity, in regard to fundamental matters, is stimulating and full of insight."

+ — Ath 1912,1:436 Ap 20 120w

"Mrs. Hermann gives a fair and readable presentation of the doctrines of two great thinkers, and then considers them from the point of view of orthodox Christianity. What has interested us most in the volume is not the theological views of the book, but the curious similarity which certain parts of it bear to an article published in 'The Independent' more than a year before. The coincidence is all the more interesting since it does not appear that the pious authoress ever read 'The Independent' article, for no reference is made to it in the bibliography at the end or elsewhere."

This well illustrated volume is "the outcome of its author's labors during more than a decade, first in Ohio and later as officer in charge of malaria investigations for the California state board of health. It does not touch strictly medical matters: outside this, it covers virtually everything that can be said on the malaria parasite, mosquitoes in general and Anopheles in particular, the history of its accepted theory of the disease, and working methods for its control. Incidentally, there is included the more general topic of handling all mosquitoes, even down to the treatment of bites." (Boston Transcript)

"This story is Mr. Herrick's first venture in the field of romance. . . . A young man, very much out at the elbows and at the very end of his money, his wardrobe, and his courage, comes upon an elderly man lying helpless in a New York street, and discovering that a blow and not a bottle has brought him to this condition, takes him to his room. From that room the drama starts and never pauses; the unfortunate man goes to the hospital and dies, the hero starts for San Francisco, where he dares greatly and 'carries it off,' escapes to Mexico, and finally reaches Paris. . . . The story reaches its climax in an experiment to give the people the kind of drama they ought to have."—Outlook

HERRICK, ROBERT. One woman's life. $1.35
(1½c) Macmillan 13-3067

Millie Ridge is a social climber. Even at sixteen she knows that the humble house on Chicago's west side is not "the thing," and successfully maneuvers her family into a more fashionable neighborhood. With her eyes fixed on an advantageous marriage she makes, nevertheless, one mistake—she falls in love. Then having married the struggling young artist she lives out her married life in Paris and New York, still aspiring and climbing, up to the time of her overworked husband's death. A period of widowhood at the expense of her friends ends in a second marriage that opens out the way to the luxuries she needs and desires. In the author's mind Millie evidently typifies the eternal feminine; the one discerning woman character in the book calls her "a little graft-er."

"A clever but prejudiced analysis of a certain type of American woman, sordid if not morbid, and not equal to the novelist's early work, but unobjectionable from the standpoint of morals."

"It is a remarkable book that Robert Herrick has written, perhaps the best and boldest thing he has done yet. In the French episodes Mr. Herrick wanders somewhat from his theme, while those in New York are pretty commonplace; he has to fill in his heroine's time in some way, to be sure, but satire of recent events is pretty cheap padding, after the good work the reader has been observing."

In the long poem that opens this volume Mr. Hewlett tells in verse the story that he told in prose in "The ruinous face." HICHENS, ROBERT SMYTHE. Way of ambi-
10 tion. 11 *$1.35 (½c) Stokes 13-18476

Mr. Hichens' latest story is a study of the working out of a tense situation between two characters. A young man of marked musical genius who has the gift of expression only in a somewhat restricted field, is forced by the dominating personality of the very attractive girl whom he marries to abandon his own peculiar form of composition and to make a bid for popular favor as a writer of operatic music. Charman, who wants to make him famous is not ambitious for him so much as for herself. She sees herself always in prospect as the wife of a great man. The big scene of the story is that in the New York opera house on the night of the failure of his opera.

"Mr. Hichens has the knack of reaching to the heart's core of his men and women. He does not exaggerate. His Americans are real Americans and not the caricatures of Americans that so many English novelists apparently delight in. His English men and English women are the people he knows, living a life he understands and can describe with faithfulness and imagination. We cannot fail to be moved by the story, to be impressed by it, to profit by it." E. F. E.

HIGGINSON, JAMES JACKSON. Spenser's
2 Shepherd's calendar in relation to con-

12-21997

A volume issued as one of the "Columbia university studies in English and comparative literature," which offers "the most searching analysis that has yet been made of the various problems which are raised by Spenser's poem." (Nation) Part 1 of the monograph, which is concerned with The political and ecclesiastical satire of The Shepherd's calendar takes up in its two parts the Historical background and the Political and ecclesiastical eclogues. Part 2 considers The biographical relations of The shepherd's calendar.

"It seems to us clear that neither the author nor the Department has any conception of how poetry is written or what its aims and functions are."

— Ath 1912,2:755 D 21 200w

"The book is marred by the writer's singular ignorance of a fact of capital importance in the poet's life during the period under consideration—namely, that he was in 1578 private secretary to John Young, Bishop of Rochester. Ignorance of the above-mentioned phase of Spenser's career vitiates to a considerable extent the author's discussion of the poet's biography during the years 1576-1580. Despite the above strictures, we do not wish to deny that this is a treatise of decided ability. The biographical part, especially, possesses, on the whole, an unquestionable value. The book, in fine, is one, which all Spenser students should welcome."

HIGINBOTHAM, JOHN U. Three weeks in France. il *$2 Reilly & B. 13-4359

Similar in style to the author's other travel monologues, this describes a short tour in France. Landing at Havre, he journeyed "through Normandy, the Chateaux country, to the Pyrenees, across the south of France, to Mont Blanc and back to Paris, all by train." (N Y Sun)

"The breezy American style of Mr. Higinbotham makes the book diverting from cover to cover. That its humor should repeatedly remind one of Mark Twain will, we hope, be taken by the author as a compliment. The book, with its twenty-three chapters of rapid comment and description and anecdote, and no single page or paragraph devoted to Paris, proves very conclusively, if proof were wanted, that there is a France, and one well worth visiting, apart from the gay metropolis. It is a book that may induce readers to go and convince themselves of this truth by actual experience."

HILLIERS, ASHTON. Who laughs last. *$1.35 (1c) Putnam 12-22592

The plot "concerns the adventures of a young man whose devotion to a friend leads to his discharge from the army and a young woman whose father's unhappy marriage forces her into strange adventures." (N Y Times) Billy Winterbourne is the son of an erratic marriage between a staid elderly banker and a brilliant young woman of aristocratic society. Altho he has grown up under the dominance of an elder step-brother who is before all else a man of business, Billy's own ideas of business honor are very vague and the signing of his father's name to a check seems to him a simple matter of convenience. It is this harmless act that precipitates the events that follow.

"The interest suffers diminution at times, for Mr. Hilliers is not only discursive and prone to introduce details and conversations only very distantly related to the main theme, but also given to hurrying forward for two, three, four or more pages without a single break in his paragraphs. HINE, CHARLES DE LANO. Modern organization. (Works management ser.) *$2 Eng. mag. 12-20325

The author advocates the system employed on the Harriman lines. "Briefly he suggests that railroad executives be given uniform titles with less sharply defined authority, so that in the absence of the senior official the other executive officers can act for him in their own name rather than leave the decision to the chief clerk. With this idea he combines a central office file for all correspondence. Thus Mr. Hine insures that executive problems will be settled by an executive man and not a clerk. He breaks down the petty jealousies, arising from sharp departmental lines, by bringing the various executive officials into contact with each other's work. He gives them the broadest training that is so sadly lacking in a more highly specialized system." (Ann Am Acad)

"The few simple suggestions, which Mr. Hine offers, are mixed with a considerable mass of more general remarks, which make it rather hard to pick out what remedies he proposes. Yet, at a time when specialized functional management is being so strongly emphasized, his book is very timely as a reminder of the evils that over-specialization may produce." A. G. White.

A work prepared primarily for students in mechanical engineering in their junior and senior years. This treatment is supplemented by discussions of the fundamental theory of such equipment, and the practical considerations involved in their performance which account for the difference between the ideal and the actual results obtained." (Engin Rec)

"Accepting the book as it is, the reviewer finds it uniformly accurate. It is to be regretted that the authors have not been satisfied to accept the current terminology in a number of instances. HOLBACH, MAUDE M. In the footsteps of Richard Coeur de Lion. il *$4 Little A13-735

"This large and handsome volume is divided into two parts. In the first and longer division, the author tells with considerable spirit the story of the great Plantagenet who has effectually touched her imagination and aroused that enthusiasm which has a good deal to do with the attractiveness of such a book as this. In the second division the author describes her own travels or pilgrimages to the regions most connected with Richard in his lifetime, and leads us, with a good deal of picturesque description, first through Normandy, Touraine, Anjou, Poitou, Aquitaine, then to the sea-coast of Palestine and, finally, to the scene of Richard's captivity in the castles and towns on the Danube and the Rhine."—Spec

HOLDER, CHARLES FREDERICK. Quakers¹² in Great Britain and America. il *$6 (3c) McClurg

The author states that, while there are a number of modern works devoted to various periods and phases of Quakerism, he finds there is no work, either in England or America, that gives a popularly written, well illustrated, condensed history of Quakerism as a whole. It is this want that he has attempted to supply, and it is a history of Quakerism from the birth of George Fox to the present time that he presents in this volume. The history of the Quakers has a particular interest to the people of the present day, for, as the author says, "The Quakers were the pioneers in 1656 in every dominant reform normal men and women are fighting for in 1913." One of these was equality for women.

"There is much in the volume that will be useful to genealogists. Mr. Holder seems to have missed the Quaker birthright of mysticism, and to have an inadequate comprehension of the meaning of the 'Light within' by which the Quakers guided their way, but he has a hearty appreciation of the lofty morality and the true religion that have always characterized the Society of Friends."

Quick witted and pretty Sally, like Nell Gwynne, stepped into public favor at a playhouse and could have chosen a name from a dozen titles. But fate cast her for playing the part of an absent ward at a country place when the Black Romsey was returning from Italy, but so black did she find him that she ran away, thus bringing about the first of a series of fights waged for her protection. Unlike the famous Nell, she preferred honor to position and withheld her love until repentance and service to others in the great plague had so purified a heart that its nobility matched the greatness of its name.

"Is an exposition of plans for adapting school organization to the needs of individual children. The first half of the book is devoted to grading, classification, and special schools for normal children; the second to special classes for sub-normal children. The plan of the book is to describe in one place different methods which have been tried out here and abroad, for the treatment of a special problem. A clear, concise statement is given of each method, its advantages and disadvantages, together with running comment by the author. Opinions of educators and students are quoted at some length. Reference is made to the training of teachers for giving individual instruction, work in special classes and correction of speech defects. Some space is devoted to promotion intervals, classification, departmental teaching, 'manumetal' schools, and the Montessori methods. The second part of the book deals with a description of auxiliary schools for mental defectives here and abroad, plans of study, and various psychological intelligence tests."—Survey

"Useful as a clear and comprehensive exposition of different plans, but no critical and comparative evaluation of the success of the therefore, no way of knowing what the book treats of without examining every chapter.

The index is in two parts, both incomplete.
Proper names are incorrectly given. Diagrams are unnecessarily confusing. Another fault, and one more difficult to remedy, is that the author, being himself thoroughly conversant with the subjects he treats, takes it for granted that the reader is also, and uses technical phrases and historical allusions without inter-

"Mr. Cotterill's aim in his translation of the 'Odyssey' into English hexameters has been to reproduce, as far as possible, the simplicity, directness, and rapidity of the original; to avoid archaic, affected, and 'literary' diction; and to be literal as far as is consistent with natural idiomatic diction."—Ath

+ — Ath 1912:164 Ja 20 370w

+ Dial 53:499 D 16 '12 230w

"It is hardly too much to say that in no other translation of Homer does one come quite so near to the feeling of the original. Mr. Cotterill has made a really literal translation, and he has put it into English that is akin in spirit to the rapid, vigorous, simple, and musical language of the Homeric poem. The difficult meter he has handled with skill and has made it, to use his own words, descriptive of what he thought such a form should suggest, 'like the downward rush of an impetuous stream.'"

HORN BLOW, ARTHUR. Argyle case. il *$1.25
10 (2c) Harper 13-18716

This is a retelling in fiction form of the story of the play of the same name, one of the recent "crime plays" which seem to hold first place in popular favor. The plot is concerned with the murder of John Argyle, a millionaire; suspicion falls on the son and on a young girl. Argyle's adopted daughter; and Asche Kayton, a new detective in drama and in fiction, is given an opportunity to display his astuteness.

"The plot has too many improbabilities to carry any conviction. All the same, the book has the merit of holding the reader's attention to the end."

HORNUNG, ERNEST WILLIAM. Thousandth woman. il *$1 (2½c) Bobbs 13-22448

When Henry Craven, who had brought death or trouble to all associated with him, was murdered at his home, the police found few clues beyond a hazy description of a bare-headed man who ran across the lawn. The son of Craven's former partner arrives soon from Australia and succeeds in clearing a suspected man of the charge of murder, but in so doing weaves a chain of circumstantial evidence against himself which an amateur detective fits into such a convincing charge that even the thousandth woman nearly doubts his denial. Freedom and love hang in the balance but loyalty and devotion swing the scales of justice to a happy outcome.

As minister of religion, soldier, author, college professor, lecturer, librarian, and what else beside we will not attempt to say, he has seen life in many aspects and rubbed elbows with men of many sorts and conditions. . . . His war memories and his experiences in Germany and France at the outbreak of the conflict between those two countries are just sufficiently stirring to make doubly agreeable by contrast the record of his intercourse with the illustrious men of peace, the scholars and writers and statesmen whom it was his fortune to meet from time to time."

HOUGHTON, STANLEY. Hindle wakes. 75c (¾c) Luce, J. W. (Eng ed 12-18807)

The plot of this three-act play is similar to that of Galsworthy's "Eldest son," except that in this case the characters are Lancashire weavers and mill owners, rather than country gentry. Two young people, the son of the mill owner and one of the girl weavers in the mill, have so far compromised themselves that an immediate marriage is demanded by the girl's family. The boy's father is likewise insistent that the wrong be righted. He himself is willing to acquiesce; all has been arranged satisfactorily when the girl, with a determined independence unlooked for in one in her position, refuses to let herself be married on the terms offered.

In the pursuit of this object the author deals at considerable length with all the important arguments and phrases of the Report of the commission. Among the leading points which he seeks to establish in opposition to the contentions of the commission are the following: Recent immigration has not increased unemployment; nor displaced native Americans in industry; nor provoked an increase of race suicide; nor set up inferior standards of living; nor underbid the native workers; nor prevented the reduction of the work day; nor hindered labor organization; nor given us our present labor problem."—Cath World

HOUSMAN, LAURENCE. King John of Jingalo. *$1.35 (1c) Holt. 12-27190

The kingdom of Jingalo is quite plainly modern England just as the church of Jingalo, treated with such biting satire, is the revered established church. In the members of the royal family, however,—the kindly King John who learns to see thru the farce of his kingship, the prince with revolutionary and socialistic ideas, the princess who escapes from the palace to be arrested in a suffragette riot—there is evidently no attempt at portraiture. No social convention escapes unscathed—yet the satire is often kindly, especially so in the case of the much maligned suffragettes, disguised lightly here as the "Women chartists."

"The author will interest those who know him and his views, but we fear that his touch is not light enough to secure the attention of the larger audience he seeks."

"The thinness of the 'Jingalese' disguise is the making of the book, because while its farcical surface spares it the imputation of an attack, it still delights as only direct and good-natured satire can delight. Like most satires, it fails to be taken seriously because it fails to take its subject seriously; the plot and the characters suffice for amusement and for holding up other things for amusement, but in so doing the elements of the story have lost their other functions and cease to seem real."

After years of travel in foreign lands, Mr. Howells, at the age of seventy-four, realized the boyhood dream, dating back to his first reading of Cervantes, of visiting Spain. His experiences with his matured and mellowed judgments of places and people are described in this book. The chapter titles are: Autobiographical approaches; San Sebastian and beautiful Biscay; Burgos and the bitter cold of Burgos; The variety of Valladolid; Phrases of Madrid; A night and day in Toledo; The great gridiron of St. Lawrence; Cordova and the way there; First days in Seville; Sevillian aspects and incidents; To and in Granada; The surprises of Ronda; Algeciras and Tarifa.

HOWELLS, WILLIAM DEAN. New Leaf Mills.
* $1.50 (3½c) Harper 13-35064

A story reminiscent of the middle west of Mr. Howells's boyhood. The chronicle—he does not call his story a novel—is concerned with Owen Powell, a visionary dreamer who, after business failure in the city, takes his family to the backwoods thinking to found there a communistic community after the order of Robert Owen. He buys a run-down flour mill and tries to establish a paper mill; his schemes fail, but, undaunted, he fixes his eyes on a new vision and starts a new venture.

"The country life of the middle west in the period following the Mexican war is depicted so graphically as to give the story the effect of a transcript from actual experience, which it no doubt in part is."

HUBBARD, ARTHUR JOHN. Fate of empires; being an inquiry into the stability of civilisation. *$2.10 Longmans A13-936

"In the first portion of his work the author discusses the possibility of a permanent civilization, the basis on which it could be founded, and the forces that make either for growth or for decay. . . . In dealing with the methods of reason and instinct he defines the former as the power of drawing inferences, a stage in advance of instinct, in that the latter, knowing nothing beyond the immediate gratification of the inborn impulse, is at the mercy of its immediate surroundings. But reason itself, he says, will in due course be found to be marred by a disability peculiar to itself a disability that in its turn is only to be made good by adoption of yet another line of advance. Thus, step by step, he carries his argument on until it arrives at its conclusion, namely, that the method of religious motive is the only one capable of furnishing a true and stable civilization."—Ath

HULL, ELEANOR. Northmen in Britain. il¹⁰ *$1.50 (2c) Crowell

These stories of the Danish and Norse invasions into Britain and Ireland in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries are based upon the Northern sagas and on the English and Irish chronicles. Part one of the book is made up of stories of "The age of the Vikings"; part two of tales of "The Danish kingdom of England."

HUNGERFORD, EDWARD. Gertrude. *$1.25
(1½c) McBride, Nast & co. 13-8393

The story of a New York family that goes into the country to take charge of an old inn. "The chief interest, however, is not in the Paddleford family as a whole, but in Gertrude, the oldest daughter—slim, dark-haired, fair-skinned, and near-sighted, who changes from a self-centered, unaffectionate bookworm, to a helpful woman, making sacrifices without talking about them. It is she who plans and works most for the hotel, while Harry Bushnell is studying art and moral concentration in Paris. Her impending blindness brings the book very near to tragedy, but being a novel, all ends happily." (Boston Transcript)

"A readable though somewhat carelessly written story."

+ — A L A Bkl 10:35 S '13

"The story is constructed without the slightest regard for unity and compactness, and the plot is consequently haphazard and without enough action to justify its length. HUNT, ELIZABETH ROXANA. Play of today:
 4 studies in play-structure for the student and theatre-goer. $1.50 Lane 13-2491

These dramatic studies, some of which have already seen publication, deal with recent plays as illustrations of essentials in the drama. "Disraeli" is taken to give point to the chapter on the climax; "A doll's house," catastrophe play; "Lady Windermere's fan" for high comedy or the comedy of manners. Other chapters consider drama study, the rise and growth of action, the fall and close of action, the unities in the modern play, the soliloquy in the modern play, the purpose play and its limitations, the play for children.

"The book is platitudinous and invertebrate; its conclusions lie hidden under a stream of cautions and reservations; and the author trembles under the weight of her own definitions. Some casual chapters show, however, that the author understands points relating to actual play-production."

— + Ath 1913,2:45 J1 12 570w

"The book should be in many ways useful to the layman who would know more of the drama than he can learn from newspaper notices of current theatrical productions. Especially useful are the chapters dealing with the structure of the play and the several types of drama presented on the modern stage." J. W. Tupper.

— + Dial 54:460 Je 1 '13 1100w

"It is difficult to determine wherein the special value consists. Such traditional laws of dramatic composition as are quoted are not particularly instructive, while the illustrations are not always authoritative or the opinions founded upon them indisputably sound. But the writer exhibits a wide acquaintance with theatrical literature, chats pleasantly enough upon a large variety of topics, and supplies a number of hints which will be fresh to novices if not to experts."

— + Nation 96:424 Ap 24 '13 500w

"It is so vaguely written that those familiar with the subject are not likely to find it interesting, while those looking for information are apt to be disappointed. HUXLEY, JULIAN SORELL. Individual in the animal kingdom. (Cambridge manuals of science and literature) Il *40c (1c) Putnam 13-6037

"The task I have attempted in the following pages is a two-fold one. First, I have tried to frame a general definition of the Individual, sufficiently objective to permit of its application by the man of science, while at the same time admitted as accurate (though perhaps regarded as incomplete) by the philosopher. Secondly, I have tried to show in what ways Individuality, 'as thus defined by me,' manifests itself in the animal kingdom. . . . The major portion of this book is devoted to showing that living matter always tends to group itself into these 'closed, independent systems with harmonious parts.' Though the closure is never complete, the independence never absolute, the harmony never perfect, yet systems and tendency alike have real existence. Such systems I personally believe can be identified with the Individuals treated of by the philosopher, and I have tried to establish this belief. But what's in a name? 'the systems are there whatever we may choose to call them,' and if I have shown that, I shall be content."—Preface

HYDE, WILLIAM DE WITT. Quest of the best. 13 *$1 (2c) Crowell 13-19010

This work, published with the sub-title "Insights into ethics for parents, teachers, and leaders of boys," was prepared in collaboration with a group of Bowdoin college students who, the author says, had not lost their recollections of boy life. That boys are by nature bad is the author's first premise. But this natural badness, he goes on to prove, is elemental goodness out of place. The six chapters are headed: Natural badness the germ of goodness; Artificial goodness the repression of badness; The quest of the best; Missing the best: sins of excess and defect; The personal motive and the social medium; The birthright of the child.

"One may take exception to the general indictment if it is made to carry more than the fact that adjustments to the social order are necessarily faulty in the immature by virtue of inexperience, poor example, and defective nurture. Probably an equally good case can be made out for the exact opposites of these vices. The adult reader may not enjoy the repetition which seems rather suited to less mature minds." Allan Hoben.

"These further reminiscences begin with the year 1889, and all the great social and political movements that have since that time agitated English public life are described with a dash, a spirit, and genial picturesqueness which are absolutely fascinating. . . . Socialism, the tariff, home rule, woman suffrage, all that people and papers are talking about now are described with personal descriptions of the main figures from Michael Davitt to Henry Labouchère, in the shifting kaleidoscope of public life. Thus the book is interesting to the highest degree, and makes the past few decades of English history live again in a clear and vivid light."—Lit D

"The book has been prepared as a text for a course given by one of the authors with special attention to the needs of the student who has neither the time nor the mathematical training to pursue the subject at as great length as given in the larger treatises. The work is based on that of Fourier. . . . In an attempt to point out a few of the many important and interesting applications of the mathematical theory of heat conduction several illustrative problems have been solved. These include loss of heat through pipe coverings, flow through boiler plate and furnace walls, depth of freezing of the earth due to diurnal and annual heat changes, temperature waves in cement, theory of fireproof walls, cooling of the earth with and without radioactivity considerations, etc."—Engin Rec

"Unfortunately the authors have failed to consider the problem of the rate of heating of the electric oven or furnace. Although they may be justified in excluding such subjects from the 'mathematical theory of heat conduction' they would have rendered their book much more valuable to engineers if they had given more space to the consideration of the effects of convection and radiation. The author gives in concise form a sketch of English economic history, paying especial attention to the development of manufactures. "A preliminary sketch-map which may assist the explorer," is Mr. Innes's description of his book, and it is happily worded. The subject is indeed vast. General principles of the gravest importance are involved. . . . The Statute of labourers and the factory acts may be taken as especially significant examples. JACKSON, HOLBROOK. All manner of folk. 11 $1.50 (3½c) Kennerley (Eng ed A13-1266)

The title of the first essay, "Concerning personalities," might have served as the title for the book. Studies of Lewis Carroll and Edward Lear as "Masters of nonsense," papers on Poe, Whitman, Meredith, John M. Synge, Edward Carpenter, Max Beerbohm, and others make up its contents. "In spite of the seeming diversity of matter . . . there is, nevertheless, a single thread which touches each unit. This common element is a strong optimism, which culminates in the last essay 'Superman.' . . . There is no flippancy in this optimism, nor any wild shouting and waste of nerve energy in the waving of banners for the cause; it is a serious optimism, active, vigilant and keen—but never frantic." (Boston Transcript)

"We owe him a pleasant hour for his nineteen papers and the five illustrations by modern artists; every essay sparkles and glows with good humour, whether it treats of 'Superman' or the bold and original pottery of those true craftsmen the brothers Martin of Brownlow street."

+ Ath 1912, 2: 58 J1 20 950w

"From the first the essays prove attractive, and lure one on at a greater rate of speed than the material will permit, for one is constrained to think, and to think pleasurably hard, as one reads, the author's sympathy—which is perhaps most apparent in his discussion of Whistler—his intense interest in life and in men, and his personality are communicated to the reader through the vigor and alertness of the composition."

JAMES, HENRY. Small boy and others. il *$2.50 (3c) Scribner 13-7116

It is a subjective picture of a boyhood in old New York that Mr. James gives in this volume of memories. The work began with an attempt to "place together some particulars of the early life of William James" but in the appeal to memory necessary to carry out this purpose a richness of material was discovered and the book as completed covers a much broader field than that originally surveyed. In fact William James appears in the volume only as an ever vanishing point on the horizon, such an advantage accruing, it seemed to the younger brother—from his sixteen months' seniority.

"Despite its involved and difficult style, the work will interest a considerable body of readers."

It is an ex-with a child's eyes, to know them with a child's perience novel and entertaining to see them fearlessness and wonder. JAMES, LIONEL. With the conquered Turk. il $2 (3½c) Small 13-5428

The official correspondent of the London Times relates the personal adventures of himself and several brother newspaper men in the field with the Turkish forces. His book discredits the reports of a complete rout of the Turks before a Bulgarian onslaught. "Half-trained troops undoubtedly fled in utter panic, and there was an enormous stream of civilian fugitives, but the better-trained soldiers retired as decently as any troops in the world would have done on empty stomachs. . . . Major James does not attempt to explain away the Bulgarian victories or unfairly to diminish the enormous credit which is justly due to the heroic victors, but he does protest against the belief that there was anything like universal rout. The Turks were defeated partly because of a lamentable administrative failure, and partly because untrained men were expected to do the work of trained men." (Spec)

JEUDWINE, JOHN WYNNE. First twelve centuries of British story. 1l *$4.50 Longmans 13-7795

The author gives consideration to the part played in the history of Britain by the Scottish, Irish, Scandinavian and English people. He "aims to write 'a clear and readable story' of the relations and development of all these four peoples as a whole, so far as they were active in the British Isles between 56 B. C. and 1154 A. D. . . . He has drawn largely and effectively for picturesque material from the too-much neglected Scandinavian sagas and Irish stories. His recognition of the widely scattered Scandinavian raids and influences in the British Isles is the most distinctive, and the best part of his book. By reproducing three mediæval maps and by inserting a score of sketch maps of his own, he shows that he understands the importance of geography in the study of history." (Nation)

"We can recommend this book to teachers and advanced students of our history. We are not disposed to agree with many of Mr. Jeudwine's deductions, and we are inclined to think that he is too anti-clerical in his sympathies, but his views arrest attention, and enforce a reconsideration of received opinions, which will be all to the good for any real student."

+ — Ath 1912,2:656 N 30 150w

"In spite of its grave defects, there is much in Mr. Jeudwine's volume which is interesting, and the stress which he lays on the importance of Scandinavian influence, if not entirely novel, is serviceable." C. L. Kingsford.

+ — Eng Hist R 28:549 Jl '13 500w

"Mr. Jeudwine properly tries to draw his material as much as possible at first hand direct from the sources, and evidences much independence of judgment. But his story is not systematic nor well rounded, and many of his explanations and suggestions are more ingenious than convincing. Nevertheless, both his point of view and his narrative are simple, clear and interesting."

JEVONS, FRANK BYRON. Personality. *$1 Putnam 13-12009

"The first chapter is a discussion of personality and impersonality. Dr. Jevons considers the thought that physical science and psychology as a science has no place in them for personality. . . . In the next two chapters Hume's position and that of James, which are denials of personality, are shown to be absurd; and Bergson's argument that change alone exists and needs no substance, and that change is self-consciousness, imply personality. The last chapter is a discussion of personality and individuality. . . . The author has not given us an exhausted study of personality, and he does not so profess, but he has shown some very important things which are involved in personality." (Boston Transcript)

 tion of students of the golden state. . . . Nevertheless, although Mr. Johnson assures us that he personally avoided following the beaten track either of the student or the tourist of California, and allowed himself to be 'guided rather by a vagrant taste for idling and road-side observation than by any desire to tilt against the windmills of great national problems,' his book is strewn with fact and comment bearing directly on the question that is just now uppermost on the Pacific coast."—N Y Times

"Mr. Arthur Johnson does not always write well, but he can do so when he likes, and his book includes excellent descriptions of scenery and many amusing stories. There are so many candid and unfriendly remarks about Americans that we imagine Mr. Johnson does not intend to return to California. JOHNSON, OWEN MCMAHON. Sixty-first second. il *$1.35 (2c) Stokes 13-35199

The most startling situation in this book, which is a combination detective story and society novel, is that presented in the first chapters. At a bohemian dinner a valuable ring belonging to the hostess is stolen. Knowing that it must be in the room, she promptly locks the doors, turns out the lights, and asks that the ring be placed on the table before she has counted to one hundred. At the sixty-first count the expected clank of metal is heard but when the lights are turned on no ring is found. The mystery of this second disappearance is placed in the hands of McKenna, a capable detective. In the interim, while he is solving it, the other characters concern themselves with society and with matters in the world of finance.

Nor is the book only a savoury dish for old students of foreign affairs; it will be useful to those who know nothing of the international situation, because whether the answer to the problems be the right one or not, the problems themselves are clearly and briefly stated. A feature of the book that can escape no one's notice is Sir Harry Johnston's habit of weaving the thoughts of an anthropologist, an ethnologist, and a student of physical science into the texture of his political thought. To our minds this adds to the attractiveness of his work, but sometimes his passion for such subjects give him a touch of the mystic."

JOHNSTON, MARY. Hagar. $*1.40 (1½c) Houghton 13-22753

Miss Johnston's first story of modern life is an interpretation of the woman movement. Hagar Ashendyne, her heroine, is a Virginian, bred in the ancient southern traditions, educated at one of the old-time finishing institutions, and destined for the time-honored "woman's-sphere." "If you could only make your mind submissive," is her grandmother's plaint. But Hagar's mind is not of the submissive type. She breaks with family conventions, rebels against its authority, and enters into the larger life that is opening out to women everywhere. Hagar marries late, after making a name as a novelist, and love is accepted by her as the crown of life, not as its end, long sought and long desired.

JONES, HENRY ARTHUR. Foundations of a national drama. *$2.50 Doran

(Eng ed 13-9558)

"In this volume he has collected twenty of the lectures or reviews on different dramatic topics, printed or delivered by him on one side of the Atlantic or the other, during the last fifteen years. Many of them he has revised and expanded, but, in their latest shape, they throw no new light upon his opinions, all of which are well known." (Nation) "The book may be regarded as a supplement to the author's first and most important confession of faith, the enthusiastic volume entitled 'The renaissance of the English drama,' which came out in the '90s. Mr. Jones had then, and still has two great ideas, namely, that the drama should treat seriously of the actual life of an age, and that a union between the drama and literature,—that is to say, between the drama and art—should now and forever be consummated." (Springfield Republican)

"Since his topics are few, and his thoughts have not materially changed during a number of years, he repeats himself in a way that would have been avoided had his volume been a consecutive treatise instead of a collection of scattered discourses. He almost writes sometimes as if the progress of our stage had stopped at the time he ceased to be one of its chief supporters, and he takes next to no account of that school of thoughtful young playwrights including Mr. Galsworthy and Mr. Granville Barker, which makes us most hopeful of the future."

"Mr. Jones's book is rich in suggestive themes, and it is impossible to touch on all of them. Here and there we think he betrays a bias. For instance, he is pretty hard on the English dramatic writers preceding his own era. Mr. Jones's style is sometimes, especially in the addresses delivered to University audiences, a little stilted and extra-literary. When he lets himself go, however, he can be brilliant." C. L. Moore.

JONES, WILLIAM TUDOR. Interpretation of Rudolf Eucken's philosophy. il $1.50 Putnam (Eng ed 13-6083)

"The philosophy of Professor Eucken is the result of the experience of his own soul. It is something that can never be understood until it is lived through. . . . When we understand that Eucken's philosophy roots itself in the deepest cravings of life, and at the same time it does not reject the temporal life but seeks to bring unity and meaning into it, then, and then only can the system be understood and the man appreciated. . . . Dr. Jones reveals to us Eucken's personality; and as Eucken's philosophy is an expression of his personality, the author of this little book has shown no little insight in unveiling that personality in an introduction to the philosophy."—Boston Transcript

"The author may be said to have succeeded, not only in setting forth the most central ideas of Eucken's philosophy, but in giving an insight into the spirit of the man and his purpose as a philosopher—an aid to interpretation, which is of peculiar importance in the present instance." D. C. Macintosh.

+ Am J Theol 17:315 Ap '13 700w

Unfortunately Dr. Tudor Jones has caught his master's lumbering manner and habit of repetition, and equally with him disdains the humble art of illustration in which the school of Spencer and Huxley shone. This book, then, cannot be recommended to the less experienced sort of reader as a substitute for Prof. Eucken's original works. JORDAN, HUMFREY ROBERTSON. Patchwork comedy. $1.30 (1½c) Putnam 13-8076

A story that moves leisurely in spite of the dramatic elements that go to make up its plot. An ancient house has been subjected to blackmail for a number of years. It is shortly before his father's death that Anthony Carfew, returning from years of travel in strange lands, learns of the misstep in his mother's youth of which the blackmailer has made capital. Not content to pay hush money he tracks the man down and sees an end put to his villainy. "The work is a careful development of a practical railroad easement curve. In the preface and introduction the author states concisely the general considerations that should fix easement standards, and justifies his spiral by setting forth the variety and inconsistencies of the standards now in use. His spiral is a practical modification of the cubic parabola, with smaller rates of change for each end to accommodate the short vertical curves in the outer rail. . . . KAUFFMAN, REGINALD WRIGHT. Running sands. $1.35 (1½c) Dodd 13-5414

This work, like the author's earlier stories, is essentially a problem novel. "Here are some of the questions that it propounds: Does a temperate, chaste and altogether blameless life afford a man the best chance for a hale and hearty old age? Has the wife a right to refuse maternity? Should a lover renounce his religion, in order to marry a divorced woman? Have May and December even the shadow of a chance of wedded happiness? Should a man, knowing that his wife has ceased to love him, take steps to give her back her freedom?" (Bookm) A marriage between a man of fifty and a girl of eighteen is the situation which gives the author the opportunity to work out his theories and express his ethical views.

"The chief fault that one may find with the work of Mr. Reginald Wright Kauffman, past and present, is that he is apt to make situations, and often rather exceptional and unlikely situations, in order to have an opportunity to voice certain personal views of morals and ethics. KELLY, MRS. ELEANOR MERCEIN. Toya the unlike. il *$1 (1c) Small 13-13540

The picturesque story of a little Japanese girl who is sent to America to live with a rich grandfather after the deaths of her American father and Japanese mother. That the grandfather had never forgiven the son adds spice to the situation. It remains for the little girl to conquer him. The story follows Toya thru the eight years of her convent education, and thru her subsequent social career, up to her happy marriage.

KELLY, REV. HERBERT H. Church and religious unity; with a preface by Rt. Rev. the Lord Bishop of Winchester. *$1.50 Longmans

"This book is one of the first fruits at once of the neo-Catholic movement in the church of England; and of those momentous spiritual forces which are at work, whether for good or evil, in the Students union and the World missionary conference. Father Kelly attempts to reach, in a spirit of charity, a better understanding of what Churchmen and Nonconformists mean by their respective attitudes." (Ath) "According to Herbert Kelly, 'religious unity' may be viewed as something more than an attractive phrase, or an ideal realizable only in pious dreams. Though the time may not be ripe for its full accomplishment, it should now begin to take form as a plan for a reunited Christianity, which may embrace not only the Anglican church and denominations such as the Presbyterians, Methodists, and Congregationalists, but ultimately the Roman Catholic and Greek churches." (N Y Times)

"We can but commend the tone and temper of the whole work. It is free throughout, not only from all traces of bitterness, but also from that tone of superiority often adopted by Anglicans, which is even more irritating than direct hostility. The writer is too egotistical and affects a colloquialism which is as artificial as any pomposity. We regret that a work addressed to a serious audience should be here and there disfigured by rather foolish witticisms, and should descend into forms of slang pardonable in their place, but here neither more nor less than puerile. Still, with all its defects, this book will be of real service alike in the ideas which it expresses and in the discussions to which it will lead."

+ — Ath 1913,1:37 Ja 25 2300w

"A spirit of humility pervades the book, which is apparently written with the desire to have the reader face candidly the many difficulties to be overcome."

KEMP, HARRY. Judas: a play. *$1.50 Kennerley

In this play the author offers a new interpretation of the act of betrayal. Believing with Peter, Thomas, and others of the disciples, that the kingdom promised was an earthly kingdom, and impatient of the delay in its fulfillment, he thought to force Jesus to declare himself. "I'll be a glorious betrayal," he says. "At a single stroke I will betray him most gloriously into that kingdom for which he came."

"After the betrayal the play should close with the Pentecostal visitation, but between Mr. Kemp has introduced the powers of evil harassing the anguished and doomed Judas. If he had been as chaste in presenting this part of his drama the whole piece would have been strong and perfect. The introduction of these evil ones to taunt Judas is, we feel, irrelevant. But one can have only admiration of the style in which the author has written. It is restrained and simple, full of poetic touches, and filled with emotional significance. It is a daring, interesting, and beautiful piece of work." W. S. B.

some mention of W. B. Yeats, Francis Thompson, John Davidson, and others. He "is a severe critic of the 'late-Victorian' literature. The characteristic of the period which he emphasizes is its feebleness. . . . The cause which Mr. Kennedy seems to assign for this impotence is that science had undermined faith towards the end of the nineteenth century." (Spec)

The author, who is an experienced woodsman and hunter, went into the southern mountains for purposes of his own, not to make a social investigation. The problem of the mountaineer is essentially an economic one, he believes. The schools needed are not the ordinary graded schools; they should be vocational, fitted to turn out trained leaders who will help their people to work out their own problems.

KESTER, VAUGHAN. Fortunes of the Land-¹ rays. il *$1.35 (1c) Bobbs

The action of this story of American life covers a period of fifty years and its characters are drawn from three generations. Only two characters appear thruout the entire narrative. These two, Virginia Landray, wife of one of the two brothers who, following the gold seekers to California in '49, met death on the plains, and Jake Benson the lawyer, whose devotion to her extends thruout a lifetime, give unity to a story which would otherwise present but a vast panorama of changing social conditions. The story comes to an end at the beginning of the present century as the grandchildren of the earlier actors are taking their places on the stage to carry on the endless drama of human life.

"Approaches within measurable distance the ideal which the public delights to envisage under the style of the Great American Novel. The long arm of coincidence has to be worked in many ways to work into one pattern the many threads of this romantic history, but the ingenuity of the author is unfeeling, and he does not strain our incredulity overmuch. In observation, variety of interest, and power of characterization, this book, with its presentation of a cross-section of the American life of its period, is really a noteworthy performance." W: M. Few students knew more intimately than did Miss Kimball the early history of Providence and Rhode Island." (Nation) "What pre-eminently distinguishes Miss Kimball's book is its intimacy of touch. In the better sense, it is the 'true' history of Providence. Through its pages we meet the seventeenth and eighteenth-century worthies of the town, self-revealed in personal and business correspondence and the inventories of estates." (Am Hist R)

"Miss Kimball's 'Providence in colonial times' is a book which will appeal primarily and especially to the people of Providence itself, but which can hardly fail to be of interest to Rhode Islanders generally and to students of New England life. For the non-Rhode Islander the chapter 'The shipping trade' is the most vital of the book." I. B. R.

"The present work, while exhibiting an easy familiarity with local and personal details, rarely loses sight of the general historical background, and entitles the book to a high place in the scanty list of first-rate local histories. The checkered career of Roger Williams has nowhere been traced with a better mixture of sympathy and impartiality than in Miss Kimball's first three chapters; and the

KIMBALL, KATE FISHER. English cathedral journey. il *$1.50 (3c) Crowell 13-5486

A well-illustrated guide to the English cathedrals. Nine chapters are devoted to the cathedrals of Canterbury, Rochester, Lincoln, Durham, Ely, Salisbury, Lichfield and York, with an introductory chapter on some characteristics of cathedral architecture in England. A selected bibliography and a glossary of architectural terms complete the volume. The author is executive secretary of the Chautauqua organization and the several chapters of this book were first prepared for publication in the Chautauquan magazine.

KINDL, FREDERICK HENRY. Rolling mill industry. il $2 Penton pub. co. 13-21533

"As the author states in his preface, this book is a summary of American rolling mill practice, its development being traced from the beginning to the present day. The first chapter is historical, starting from the first plate mill, built in Germany in 1780, and coming down to modern applications of electricity. The next chapter classifies rolling mills, and the third chapter is devoted to finished products, giving statistical tables of the annual output of various steel products. The wire industry, the tube and pipe industry and the tin andterne plate industry are each given a chapter. The book closes with a variety of useful statistical information."—Engin Rec

"Anyone unacquainted with the operation of rolling mills yet who desires a general idea of this branch of the iron and steel industry, will do well to read Mr. Kindl's book."

KING, BASIL. Way home. il *$1.35 (1c) Har-
11 per 13-19944

A story that touches on vital things. It begins back in the seventies when Charley Grace is a boy of five in the rectory of St. David's church in lower Manhattan. It extends over a long period of time, leaving Charley a man nearing forty and facing the possibility of death, according to a specialist's calculation, within two years. Charley is an idealistic boy with the conviction that he is designed for the ministry, but certain incidents in his mother's experience, in his father's, and in his own, convince him of the insincerity of the church and the hollowness of Christianity. He forsakes his early ideals, determined to live by one law, that of self. He does so, and wins the success he desires, but wins it at the expense of satisfaction and self respect. He faces the need of something outside of self that is greater than he, and finds the way to its realization.

"A painful and depressing though well written book."

"One resents the sweeping generality of the title. Mr. King has solved no universal problem, has written no up-to-date 'Pilgrim's progress,' has set up no sign-post which may point the bulk of groping humanity to a higher way. His hero's case is too exceptional, too specialized for that." F: T. Cooper.
